BETTE DAVIS' True Life Story

DEANNA DURBIN

Look at the "Quints" as a DOCTOR does...

ANY ONE of the charming Dionne Quintuplets would make a mother's eyes beam with pride were she her own child. These wonder children of the world are startling living examples of what new-day knowledge will do for babies. Proper feeding, care and training combine to develop completely the peak possibilities of every child. The fact that Karo Syrup has been an important food in their daily diet is convincing evidence of the remarkable food-energy value of this delicious Table Syrup. Karo is rich in Dextrose, which is known as "muscle" sugar.

Dextrose quickly provides material for energy, wards off fatigue, sustains activity. Both Blue Label and Red Label Karo are equally rich in Dextrose.

Such excitement! Crowded around the broadcasting microphone, the "Quints" are curious, elated and eager to know "what it's all about."

A "swing full" of loveliness—all five tots love to pose for pictures. They radiate health and personality.

World Copyright, 1937, NEA Service, Inc.

Grocers everywhere sell Karo. It's as economical as it is delicious and energizing.

Hearts Skip a Beat

She evades close-ups...Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored the warning of "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

PERHAPS you've seen her—this girl whose wistful beauty captures the eager glance. You stare—a little breathless—waiting for that smile which will light up, intensify, her loveliness.

And then it comes—but with what bitter disappointment! For her smile is dull, dingy. It erases her beauty as if a candle had been blown out...another tragedy of dental ignorance or neglect.

NEVER NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

The warning may some day come to you—that faint tinge of "pink" upon your tooth brush. It may seem harmless, trivial, unimportant—but never ignore it!

At the first sign of "pink tooth brush"—see your dentist. It may not mean trouble ahead, but let him decide. Modern menus—from which hard, fibrous foods have largely disappeared—are robbing your gums of necessary work. They've grown flabby, sensitive. "Pink tooth brush" is simply their plea for help. And usually your dentist's suggestion will be "more exercise, more vigorous chewing" and, very often, the added suggestion, "the stimulating help of Ipana and massage."

For Ipana, with massage, is designed to benefit your gums as well as clean your teeth. Massage a little Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation within the gums increases—helps bring a new healthy firmness to the gum walls.

Why not take steps now to help protect yourself against tender, ailing gums? Make Ipana and massage a part of your daily routine. With your gums healthy and sound, your teeth sparklingly clean—there can be no disappointment, nothing to mar the beauty of your smile.

PARAMOUNT GIVES YOU "EBB TIDE"...THE FIRST SEA PICTURE IN Color

The story of a man who thought he was God!...

HUISH, the little Cockney, had sobered up long enough to take a fling at stopping this madman with the rifle. Now he lay, dying a rat's death in a pool of vitriol. Thorbecke, outcast of the Seven Seas, had done the same. Now his hands pointed in mute surrender at the cobalt heaven of this island of pearls. Only Herrick was left to defend the girl against this man who thought he was God. Herrick! University man turned beach-comber. The madman's gun lifted again, cocked. The girl saw his eyes, the eyes of a devil. The gun leveled . . . the shot rang out to shatter the somnolent quiet of the island . . . forever.

Had the madman won? Had Huish's pitiful little life been tossed on the lap of the gods in vain? Had Thorbecke brought them through the fury of the hurricane for this? Was Herrick to lose his one last chance to prove himself a man? Was this beautiful white girl to descend into the pit of a madman's private hell forever?

Let June Lang help choose your frocks for dining and dancing

For that dinner date, a sheer black wool with dainty vestee of mousseline de soie, is June Lang's choice. When she's in a mood to dance the hours away, however, she wears this youthful waltz frock of iridescent moire taffeta.

BY ANN WILLS

GOING TO A PARTY?

SO YOU'RE going to a party? Oh, excuse us! Not a party, but several? And you want to know what to wear for each? Then take a few tips from June Lang, one of Hollywood's most popular gay young things who, even though she's a glamor girl, loves parties and party frocks just as you and I.

Now that winter is close upon us, we must turn our backs on the easy informality of summer and early fall, and really get down to cases on what we're going to be wearing on formal occasions this season. Now, when I say "formal," I don't necessarily mean evening gowns alone, though I know that's what you want to hear about. We'll get to that fascinating subject before we're through, don't worry.

But first, just cast an eye on June's black wool crepe, which she has donned for her tea date and which she is going to wear to dinner later on. The perennially smart black and white ensemble achieves new distinction in this two-piece frock with the tufting of the hip pockets echoing the softness of the ruffled mousseline de soie vestee. A huge clip of rhinestones at the throat adds a touch of glitter to the black and white simplicity of this costume. A perky, bowed cone-turban, black patent tie-pumps and black accessories complement the ensemble.

June, as you know, has been called the "Modern Venus" of Hollywood, and her figure has been described by artists as the most perfect in the film colony. And if she doesn't achieve the much-desired form divine in this frock, then we've never seen one! Her sleeves are but slightly puffed at the shoulder and the pencil-slim line of her skirt descends in a straight, slender silhouette all the way down from the slight fullness at the waist. She plans to vary this versatile frock by the simple expedient of changing the color and style of the vestee. It will be feminine and dressy with ruffled inserts of delicate shell pink or pale yellow, trim and tailored with severe, high-necked white pique, dashing and sporty with dickies of brightly colored suede.

With the latter, she will wear a saucy little calot of matching suede or felt. This youthful hat style, so becoming to almost any coiffure, is very popular among the starlets. Betty Grable and Eleanore Whitney are planning at least one felt or suede skull cap with each and every outfit, and it amuses them to see how many different clips, flowers or feather ornaments they can assemble for each cap! And Constance Bennett, that arbiter of fashion, is acquiring an extensive collection of these pert little headpieces, which make themselves at home on any occasion.

A smart, simple dark dress like this one of June's is invaluable to the girl who has an active social life but a limited clothes allowance. For it is adaptable for all daytime and informal evening wear from luncheon in town to that (Continued on page 81)

★★★★ Stage Door

Last time Gregory LaCava directed a picture it turned out to be "My Man Godfrey." Now he's back again with a superb film in "Stage Door," which is certain to be regarded as one of the finest comedy dramas of the year. Taken from the George Kaufman-Edna Ferber stage success, LaCava's film version uses almost nothing but the title of the original. The result is a fast-moving, splendidly acted film of which Hollywood can be justly proud.

Most of the action centers around a girls' theatrical boarding house in New York and concentrates on the activities of several of its tenants. Followers of Katharine Hepburn will be pleased to know that their idol finally has a role which suits her talents perfectly. As a wealthy young lady interested in a stage career, she gives the part excellent handling.

As a wise-cracking song-and-dance girl, Ginger Rogers surprises almost everyone with her grand trouping. She handles both her comedy and her dramatic moments with an expert touch. And "Stage Door" will probably bring stardom to Andrea Leeds, who makes beautifully poignant the tragic role of the girl who can't get the breaks on Broadway. Adolphe Menjou is his usual splendid self as an amorous producer, and there are outstanding supporting roles by Eve Arden, Constance Collier, Phyllis Kennedy, Franklin Pangborn and Lucille Ball.—RKO-Radio.

★★★ First Lady

Gay and sophisticated entertainment, this. Not only is the story excellent, having been taken from the play by George S. Kaufman and Katharine Dayton, but Warner Brothers have here assembled a cast that does justice to every role. The cast includes Kay Francis, Anita Louise, Preston Foster, Walter Connolly, Verree Teasdale, Victor Jory, Marjorie Rambeau, Marjorie Gateson, Louise Fazenda, Lucille Gleason and Grant Mitchell.

The story concerns politics in the nation's capital, but more particularly the doings of those powers behind the thrones, the politicians' wives. Kay Francis is the spoiled but thoroughly charming wife of the Secretary of State, the grand-daughter of a former president. There has long been a feud on between her and the wife of the Supreme Court Justice. The judge's wife, Verree Teasdale, has the temerity to steal Kay's cook, a crime far worse than attempting to steal another woman's husband in Washington. So when it looks like Verree might become First Lady, Kay sets to work with a vengeance to balk her long-time enemy's ambitions.

The plot takes another turn when in her zeal she jeopardizes her own husband's chances for the presidency and therefore nips in the bud her own chance of being First Lady. Directed by Stanley Logan.—Warner Brothers.

★★★ The Perfect Specimen

This can best be described as whimsical farce. Fortunately, it goes overboard in neither of these two dangerous departments. As a matter of fact, it's fast comedy and swell fun, with Errol Flynn in a role which should make audiences forgive him for his woefully bad "Another Dawn."

In the title role, Flynn plays a young heir to a $30,000,000 utilities fortune. A doting grandmother keeps him virtually locked up on his own estate, where she hopes to make him a mental and physical superman. Progress is rapid, and young Mr. Flynn is well on his way to become the dullest and most superior young gent in the world when Miss Joan Blondell crashes through a fence on his grounds and upsets the entire program. From there on Flynn pursues her, taking time out only to punch a truck driver in the nose, get a thirty-dollar-a-week oil station job, marry the girl and win a $25,000. reward for returning himself to grandma.

Flynn and Blondell play their lead roles to the hilt for comedy, and there are other swell performances by May Robson as grandma, Edward Everett Horton as grandma's fidgety secretary, Hugh Herbert as a crackpot poet and Harry Davenport as Miss Blondell's absent-mimnded father. Directed by Michael Curtiz.—Warner Brothers.

MANAGING MILTON

Bringing up Berle was more than a man-sized job, so his mother took it over

BY MACK HUGHES

Here is Milton with Harriet Hilliard, the de-lovely who supplied the romantic interest in "New Faces." Her top notes were good and blue, too, if you remember.

Milton Berle made a test for one movie company and was signed on it by another. His first picture, "New Faces," set him cinematically.

MANAGING MILTON, as you may imagine, has been no fool's job! In fact, it's been one person's life work. And it is one Sarah Berlenger (Berle these days) who has taken on the task, and very successfully, we might add.

It all began, Mr. B confesses, with his mother's illness. "You see, I was born in the hospital. Mom was there at the time, and I wanted to be near her." But seriously, it is impossible to keep Milton's mother out of his story for, she is his story.

Preceding the advent of young Milton, his mother worked in various New York department stores as a detective, thereby acquiring "eyes in the back of her head." All the better to later watch her youngster get the right breaks in his chosen profession—the theatre.

"My mother and I are inseparable," Milton explained. "You see, Mom has looked after and plugged for me all my life and deserves the credit for my success. Her real name is Sarah, I call her Queenie, but—and how do ya like it—she wants to be known as Sandra! Honest! As far back as when I was a punk kid too young to go to school, I wanted to act. I used to stand in front of the mirror making faces and when Uncle Moe would try to stop me, Mom would say, 'Let him alone. He wants to learn making funny faces.' "

It seems that Mrs. B. had her own thwarted ambitions, insofar as the footlights went, and resolved that little Milton wouldn't suffer the same fate. And so, she aided and abetted him. She was pleased one afternoon to learn that her son had, in his own ingenious way, embarked on a career.

Milton, it seems, had borrowed pants, coat and derby from his father's wardrobe. A fur muff of Mom's supplied the makings of a mustache and a little paste secured it in place. Unknown to Uncle Moe, his cane and shoes were pressed into service by our hero and he shuffled off to enlighten the neighbors as to how Charlie Chaplin did his stuff. By chance a theatre manager was passing and asked to see Milton's mother. (Continued on page 100)

Gay comings and goings-on behind the cinema scene

A girl's best friend, according to song and story, is her mother. But the songs and the stories, for some reason or another, don't seem to have reached Hollywood. Consider, for instance, that in the past couple of months two brand-new marriages have allegedly been rent asunder by the machinations of the brides' mothers. June Lang and Martha Raye are both single gals now, but would they have been if their respective mammas had kept their distance? The hand that rocks the cradle also shakes hell out of holy wedlock.

Best gag of the month happens in that rollicking hit, "Stage Door." Katharine Hepburn and Eve Arden are exchanging unpleasantries when Katie starts to brag about the pioneer spirit of her grandfather, who came west in a covered wagon. "Why," says Hepburn, "when he came west there were Indians in Wichita!" Says Eve: "And who do you think is living there now?"

The papers were full of items about Wallace Beery's accidental shooting on the set of "Bad Man of Brimstone," but they weren't exactly correct as to the spot where the blank cartridge entered Mr. B. The only way to explain it is to say that if Wallace had been sitting down the accident never would have happened.

Above, a cast that would be a producer's dream, until he had to pay the salaries! Songbirds Gladys Swarthout, Jeanette MacDonald, Lily Pons and Grace Moore. Below, the newlyweds, Miriam Hopkins and Anton Litvak, snapped at the Basil Rathbone party.

One of our more prominent comedians is risking his future because of his fondness for looking upon the wine when it is red. One day he got so gay on the set of a picture he was allegedly working on that the studio had to call his mother to quiet him down. Next time the studio threatens to call the wagon instead of mamma.

Clara Bow has made her comeback, but not to the screen. She's in the restaurant business. Across from the Hollywood Brown Derby, over what once was known as The Cinnabar, hangs a sign announcing "Clara Bow and Rex Bell's It Cafe." "It," if you will recall, was what Clara once possessed so much of, according to Madame Elinor Glyn. Those were the good old days, when "It" meant something pretty fancy, and no one dreamed of associating that intangible something with a restaurant. One hamburger, Clara, without onions. We don't want to cry.

Time Marches On Dept.: A few short years ago, according to the poets, if you wanted a blacksmith you had but to look under the nearest spreading chestnut tree. But the mighty men have disappeared, for Metro spent three days last month locating a smithy to work on the horses being used in "Bad Man of Brimstone." The report is that for the first two days they couldn't even find a chestnut tree.

A movie commentator who fills the air waves with his ravings and his rantings recently addressed a public rebuke to Garbo. According to the garrulous gent, two stars who knew Garbo were conversing on the Metro lot when the Great One ambled by without so much as a nod for either of them. This, said our friend to his millions of listeners, was very bad. And here's what really happened. It was the commentator, and not two stars, whom Garbo passed. The guy, who didn't know her, said hello. Garbo marched silently on. Later, when apprised of his radio blast, she said to a friend: "If I had known the little man, I would have said hello to him."

According to the script of "The Buccaneer," the most ferocious guy around is Jean LaFitte, the pirate king. But if you drop in on the set you'll find the person they really fear most is no pirate at all, it's Cecil B. DeMille. Always a master of the sharp retort and the stinging rebuke, C. B. is outdoing himself on his latest picture. Three script girls called it quits before the picture was half completed, and a lot of the extras, on whom most of the directorial wrath falls, wish they could afford to walk out. Why doncha pick on someone in your own income bracket, Mr. DeM?

All of which reminds us of a DeMille story which has been going the Hollywood rounds. On one of his recent pictures, he was directing a mob scene rehearsal when he heard someone talking. When he found the guilty gal he called her up on the platform in front of the crowd. "Now repeat," he said, "what you were saying down there." "Okay," said the girl. "I said 'I wonder when that soandso is going to call lunch.'" Said DeMille: "Lunch!"

Saw Carole Lombard and Una Merkel in jail the other day. It was all for their art, though, and a scene for their new picture, "True Confession." We watched several takes, until Wesley Ruggles got the scene the way he wanted it. Then they let Lombard and Merkel out of jail, and we went over to say hello. "Don't get me wrong," said Una, "I'm only visiting here. It's Carole who's really behind the bars." Una also told us she had been in pictures eight years and had never met Carole until she started work in "True Confession." She thinks Miss L. is swell. So we talked to Carole, and she told us La Merkel was one of the finest. What is this? Two nice people saying nice things about each other in Hollywood. It looks like the millennium to us!

On the "True Confession" set there's a pleasant looking chap who sits unobtrusively on the sidelines. When visitors crowd around he gets out of the way, and when prop boys drag furniture around him he moves quietly out of their line of fire. Only a few people on the set know who he is—the rest pay no attention. And the guy is Claude Binyon, who wrote the script of the picture, and whose hilarious dialogue was mainly responsible for the smashing success of "I Met Him In Paris."

Goofy Conversation: During the recent holidays, Fay Wray asked her maid to phone a certain producer. When the maid was unable to reach him Fay said, "Oh, I forgot all about Yom Kippur." "Yom Kippur?" said the maid. "He sure can sing, can't he?" The incident ended there for the moment, and it took Fay two days to discover the young lady was talking about Jan Kiepura.

Over at Columbia, a producer was highly displeased with a set of portrait photos of the studio's new importation, Luli Deste. Tearing out the few remaining hairs he keeps for such purposes, he rushed to the make-up department and cornered the head man. "What's the matter here?" he yelled. "Miss Deste looks bad." "Well," said the guy, "I worked all day on her. What else can I do?" "That's easy," said the producer, "Get two make-up men!"

Studios always frown when two stars run off to Yuma or points west and come back man and wife. They contend that the fans prefer to have their idols single, that no one can devote much time to a dream man or dream woman if he or she has a legal spouse in the offing. The whole contention was royally disproved at the opening of "Zola" at the Carthay Circle. With practically every star in town in attendance, do you know who got by far the biggest hand from the fans assembled in front of the theatre? Gene Raymond and Jeanette MacDonald. So maybe that proves something.

In the middle of the Hollywood heat wave, Sally Eilers and company were in the desert on location for "Highway to Hell." When the thermometer hit 113 Director Lew Landers said, "That title isn't fooling. This really feels like the highway to hell." "Highway nothing," responded Sally, "we're inside the city limits."

Just a couple of the girls having themselves a time. Benita Hume, who is Ronald Coleman's gal friend, and Maureen O'Sullivan stop off at the Waldorf for a snack prior to Maureen's sailing for London.

Kay Francis and Charles Boyer attend the opening of "The Prisoner of Zenda." Mr. B.'s pretty wife, Pat Paterson, and Kay's boy-friend, obligingly stepped aside while the two stars were snapped.

More goes on than tennis playing at the Beverly Hills Tennis Club, it would seem. Here we have Virginia Bruce and Johnny Green trying out "The Big Apple."

Carole Lombard and Tommy Kelly, the little boy from the Bronx who is making good in a big way, sit themselves down on the steps of Carole's dressing bungalow for a heart-to-heart chat.

Hollywood Tragedy: Less than two years ago, Martha Raye was just a nice kid who could sing and clown around, and loved to do both. She had night club jobs which didn't pay her much, but she was having a swell time. Today she is one of the biggest box-office sensations in the country, and her weekly income runs close to two thousand dollars per week. But she's not having much fun any more. Like many who get famous in a hurry, she's having her troubles; family, relatives, lawsuits and everything. So the girl who used to sing for her supper now gets two thousand a week and cries herself to sleep every night.

Have you heard about Shirley Temple's Good Will Club? Everyone who belongs gets a badge resembling a policeman's shield. A Hollywood writer who has one was recently arrested in Mexico for speeding and tossed into the local bastille. He suddenly thought of the Good Will badge and whipped it out on the jailer, who was terribly impressed. He gave our friend a nicer cell.

Tony Martin dropped into a Beverly Hills shop the other day to buy some shirts. The place looked deserted, but he finally spied a man bending over a shelf behind one of the counters. "Hey," said Tony. "How about some service?" "Right away, sir," replied the gent, coming to attention. It was Don Ameche, who had gone into the shop a few minutes before, and finding no one around, proceeded to help himself. We still don't know whether or not Tony got his shirts.

Out on the "Bad Man of Brimstone" set, Joseph Calleia told us about the best advice he's ever had. It was from his brother, at the time Joe began his career. Said Brother: "If you get bad criticisms of your work, don't pay any attention to them. And if you get good criticisms, for Gosh sakes, don't pay any attention to them either."

the critics lauded her in "Come and Get It," her first big picture. Frances believed all the nice things they said about her, almost immediately assumed the role of a haughty star and entirely forgot the fact that she owed everything to a lucky break. So when critics panned her work in "Toast of New York," she couldn't understand their attitude. Finally it dawned on her that possibly she hadn't yet reached the stature of a Duse or a Bernhardt, so she set about to make repairs. She spent two months doing stock in the East, and now she's back in town a chastened gal. Or at least until her next big hit.

Embarrassing Moments Dept.: At the recent tennis matches, Clark Gable and Carole Lombard occupied one of the center boxes. Guess who had the box right next to theirs. It was Rhea Gable, and it can be reported that occupants of both boxes appeared intently interested in watching the tennis court.

Since the Orsatti-Lang break-up, the groom has been dividing his time between Virginia Field and Eleanore Whitney. The bride has been more consistent. She has devoted her time almost exclusively to Morrie Morrison, wealthy young local sportsman. On a good evening you can see Vic and Virginia at a table for two and June and Morrie holding hands at the same night spot. Incidentally, Morrie's hand is worth holding, for at the drop of a hat he can put it on two or three million bucks of his own money.

Here's a Hollywood arithmetic problem that's hard to figure out. Marlene Dietrich draws down something like two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for making a picture, and her pictures seldom show a profit. Universal's "100 Men and a Girl" will make well over a million dollars, and its star, Deanna Durbin, receives two hundred and fifty dollars per week. How about dividing up some of the loot, Marlene?

THAT GIRL'S HERE AGAIN!

She gets what she goes after, does our Joan, because she won't take "No" for an answer.

BY VIRGINIA T. LANE

IT'S THIS way," said the producer. "You've got the looks, Joan, but you can't dance!"

"Humph!" said Joan Fontaine and rumpled her bright hair and squinted those perfectly good hazel eyes of hers. "I thought Fred Astaire was to dance alone in 'Damsel In Distress.'"

"You've been reading the papers again," said the producer. "Fred is going to do a number or two with the girl selected to be his leading lady. So-ooo . . ."

"So I'll be back!" said Joan. That should have warned him, but producers are seldom warned. He went right on searching for a new partner for Astaire.

Then one fine morning the producer's secretary announced in no uncertain terms, "She's back." And there was Joan in a practice outfit going into her dance on his bearskin rug. Doing a symphonic tap that was tops almost on the animal's head. It was too much for the gentleman. He ordered a test made. He ordered a few explanations.

Joan chortled. "That's easy. I've been taking lessons during my noon hour and at night. Then I went to the dance director here at the studio and I've been working out with him." P.S. She got the part.

Until she was two years old, Joan was so ill they had to keep her wrapped in cotton wadding. Then, at three, Stanford University professors gave her the Terman Intelligence Test and rated her ten points higher than a genius. That's Joan Fontaine for you.

She is nineteen now—and beautiful. However, it's the flame of her you see first. There is something so young and eager and fearless about her, it's almost tangible. Once, on the way to Tokio, the ship she was on struck a typhoon. Instead of huddling in the main cabin with the other passengers, Joan strapped herself to a post on deck with her belt and watched in a fervor of excitement.

She was born in Japan—October 22, 1917, in the International Settlement in Tokio, the second daughter of an attractive young British couple. The elder daughter, aged three and affectionately known as "Ollie," asked Nikko for a baby sister. And Nikko, of course, could draw them from the sky. He was the estimable Oriental who divined your fortune in the sand for one yen and whose wisdom often startled even the older members of the interested community.

The first time he caught sight of Joan, he made an obeisance that swept the ground. His Nipponese calm crumpled surprisingly. "She will be great, this one. Among the famed of the earth," he said excitedly. But the mother only laughed gently. "You said that about our first baby!"

"That is well," Nikko nodded, unperturbed. "You are blessed."

She felt pretty much that way about it herself, even though the baby was so frail and strangely quiet. Finally the doctors gave their decision. If Joan were to live at all, she would have to live on the mainland. In America. Without further to-do the family left for San Francisco and settled in a small town near it, sprawling in a sunny valley, a town ready-made for healthy, robust kids. Ollie was one of them from the first. But not her sister.

It was enough to give anyone a man-sized inferiority complex. But it made Joan want to fight. She had to show them, she had to travel under her own steam without help from anyone. It became the ruling obsession of her life and it explains much that happened later.

"Joanie, stop! You'll kill yourself!" Terrified screams from the neighbors. But she paid no attention. She had never ridden a bicycle before. Now she was on Ollie's, coasting down the steepest hill in town. Loving it. By a miracle, coming to a safe stop five blocks away.

"Joanie, if anything had happened to you I would have died, too." Ollie's dark little head was against the golden one. They clung to each other. Sensitive, sweet kids. Worlds apart in temperament, closer than two little peas in a pod in devotion.

THE NIGHT they learned their parents were getting a divorce, they cried in one another's arms for hours. Then Joan suddenly turned and thumped her pillow. "Up," she said on a last half sob. It was a by-word between them. You had to keep your chin up no matter what happened.

After it was all over, Meg, as they adoringly called their mother, and the two girls drew more together than ever. Meg always was interested in the theatre and she had drilled them in Shakespeare (Continued on page 97)

The Whitneys will be sailing in southern waters soon

BY Mae Tait

MRS. HOWARD F. WHITNEY told me, the other day, that they hope to do some sailing in the South this winter. The Whitneys had a lovely summer on Long Island—and on the Sound. Mrs. Whitney is a skillful yachtswoman and handles a racing class boat like an expert. Their converted New York 40, the Chinook, is a very "shippy" boat.

Mrs. Whitney will be remembered as the former Hope Richardson. Her wedding was an outstanding social event. I recall how enchanting Mrs. Whitney looked as a bride, in a gown of white satin with a yoke of net embroidered in tiny pearls, and her tulle veil held in place by a bandeau of orange blossoms. This year Mrs. Whitney's committee work had much to do with the success of the colorful Greentree Fair at Manhasset. During the summer she got in a lot of tennis, riding, and—as always—sailing and cruising.

Hope's enthusiasm for the energetic life is proverbial among her friends. "Don't you ever get tired?" I asked. "Of course," she laughed. "After a long trick at the helm, or any time I feel worn out, I refresh myself with a Camel—and get a 'lift'! I can smoke Camels steadily, without the slightest feeling of harshness on my throat." Which shows how mild Camels are! It's true that women find the costlier tobaccos in Camel's matchless blend more enjoyable.

FREDRIC MARCH

Freddie looks pretty serious here, but he shouldn't. Not after romping through "Nothing Sacred," with Carole Lombard for a playmate. Mr. M. is one of the most popular men in—and out of—pictures.

KATHARINE HEPBURN

Oh, my! And doesn't our Kate look too hoity-toity! But never mind, she's still the same madcap she always was, and this is all in the spirit of good clean "drahma." Don't tell us she isn't having fun!

She turned down "Cavalcade" because she didn't think it would be a success! However, "Prisoner of Zenda" with Ronald Colman sounded pretty good, so Madeleine made it.

THE MISTAKES OF MADELEINE

Never lead with your chin twice, advises Miss Carroll, who refuses to be defeated by an error

BY BENJAMIN MADDOX

SHE LOOKS like a dream on the loose. Her private life sounds as though she is the last of the Cinderellas. But when she talks to you, the vibrant flesh-and-blood woman who is the acclaimed Madeleine Carroll pops out from behind the glamor legend. You learn, then, of her errors, and it's a woman's mistakes and how she manages to overcome them that tell her true story after all.

I found that the reason we've never heard of the mistakes of Madeleine is simply because no one ever asked her about the dilemmas she's had to face down. She's never made the mistake of whining, so no one realized that she, too, has had troubled hours. Both professionally and romantically she's scored such bulls-eyes. She was Britain's reigning screen star when she came to Hollywood. Triumphantly she's combined her career with an exciting brand of matrimony. She even has extraordinary beauty and youth to boot. But all because of her mistakes and how she conquered them!

It was at the Brown Derby that I ran into her. She was lingering over a demi-tasse in one of the little booths against the wall. She'd chosen an afternoon dress of clinging black, green beads for a clash of color, and an absurdly feminine, wide-brimmed hat.

"Do join us and sit down on this side!" she called gayly. "With this hat on I can't see a thing on my right."

Beside her was Captain Philip Astley, her wealthy, fascinating husband. Then there were two studio girls who were spiritedly explaining why she should come to their respective studios on the morrow for portraits. Captain Astley was speaking on the telephone that had been whisked up. He handed it to Madeleine and she gesticulated frantically, "Who is it?" Before he could reply she was saying "Hello" in a composed tone. Then she listened simultaneously to his "It's the shop about that new luggage" and went on talking to the distant voice. She's quick like that.

She uses only lipstick for personal make-up. Her gray eyes don't have to be framed in mascara. It's her contagious sense of humor that is the surprising thing about her, though. She is quality with a kick, a cosmopolitan citizen of the world who admits that she'd laugh out loud if she ever caught herself behaving pompously.

Shortly the captain had to dash to a business appointment. "I'll see you later, darling," he told his wife.

"You'd better have tea and a snack," she thereupon vowed. "I can't eat a thing, for I've just been to an elegant luncheon and last night Myrna Loy entertained for us. There is a connoisseur of fine food!" She sighed appreciatively. She isn't one of those actresses who exist on a perpetual diet, yet she illustrated that she's wise enough not to go on an eating jag.

"You have so much," I said then. "You were an overnight hit and then you fell in love with a story-book fellow. He presented you with a swanky flat in Mayfair, a country castle outside of London, and that villa on an estate in Italy where you were married with all the peasants crowding around your private chapel. You're too perfect. Didn't you ever make any mistakes?"

She smiled. "Oh, yes indeed!"

"What were they?"

She picked up her gloves and began counting the fingers. "The major ones might be under ten. But at the time, when I was completely confused by what had happened, believe me they loomed like (Continued on page 75)

LAUGHING THE WHOLE

BY IDA ZEITLIN

DICK POWELL and Joan Blondell settled themselves on the divan.

"What side of our life would you like to know?" asked Joan politely. "The rectangular lefthand corner?"

Dick interrupted. "You gave that away last week. To the little guy with the purple whiskers, who walked backwards. Remember?"

"So I did. Well, what have we got left?"

"How about that wedge at the side, painted green, with ramblers and ants creeping over it?"

"I thought we were keeping that for our old age." She gave him a bright smile, and her voice was edged with sweetness. "Look in your little book, darling. Maybe you've got it all written down there. You see," she went on to explain, "he's supposed to have the memory in this family. I used to follow him around wide-eyed, watching him remember things. Then I noticed a little book that kept slipping in and out of his pocket. So one day I stole it, just in a spirit of scientific investigation, you understand, and discovered the worst. My husband's memory was all in his book."

"Jot-it-down-or-it's-gone-with-the-wind Powell. That's what they used to call me in school," Dick informed me pleasantly.

Whether this was spontaneous combustion or just the effect of each on the other, I couldn't tell. Asking them throws no light on the subject.

"Dick's the cheerer-upper," says Joan. "I plunge into the depths of despair, prepared to spend the rest of my life there. He hooks me out."

"I'm the Grade A worrier," says Dick. "Or was, until this woman came into my life. They wouldn't give me better than a C now."

So toss up a coin, and take your choice. Not that it matters. The effect's too pleasant to bother about the cause.

JOAN AND Dick have plenty to laugh about. They're young. They're prosperous. They're in love. They have a baby in the house who would dissipate gloom from the face of Hamlet himself. On the other hand, they've also had their share of thorns in the flesh, more than their share, you're sometimes tempted to think, when you remember that the ways of publicity denied them even a honeymoon in peace.

It was when the New York newspapers decided to make a Roman holiday of their wedding trip that Joan and Dick sought deliberate refuge in laughter. Before that, they'd laughed for the fun of it. Through that period of nerve-strain, they learned to laugh so that Joan wouldn't weep, and Dick wouldn't clench his fists to keep from socking people.

Why did they go to New York at all, you may ask, if they wanted peace? They should have known better. Not at all. On previous visits, each had been allowed to go his way unmolested. Why should it occur to them that, because they were going together as man and wife life would be made a burden to them. They took the contrary for granted. That because it was a honeymoon, their privacy would be respected like that of any other newlywedded pair. They laugh at their naiveté now. Which is one up for them. The whole thing might have made them bitter.

"I wanted to go to New York," says Joan, "because it was my home town. I'd spent so many years there, with hardly one dime to rub against another. I'd been back just once since I'd made any money, for a week of personal appearances, and five shows a day didn't leave me much time for gadding. I thought it would be fun to drag Dick 'round to the places I'd known as a kid, and see plays from the orchestra instead of the gallery, and go really shopping instead of just window-shopping. Besides, my sister Gloria was rehearsing for a play. We wanted to attend the opening." She laughed briefly. "I still think all those things would have been fun. But I'll never know. Because they were just the things we didn't do."

Dick didn't care where he went, so long as Joan went with him. They knew they'd have to meet the ships' news reporters. They were prepared to attend a party for the press. The rest of the time would be their own.

On the morning of their arrival, the reporters clambered aboard at six-thirty. The Powells were ready for them. They'd had a happy trip. They'd be good sports about this. It would soon be over. "It's no more fun for them than for us," they told each other, and went out on deck.

MAYBE BECAUSE it wasn't fun for the reporters, they decided to inject their own brand of fun into it. Maybe news was slack, and they had to build up the story. At best, newlyweds are in a spot, even when they quietly board a train, even when they enter a hotel unattended, praying that no one will recognize them for what they are. It took humor and dignity to face the barrage that waited for Joan and Dick.

They fired questions, regardless. They clamored for leg art and, when Joan refused, they pretended not to hear her. The Powells remained patient throughout. They knew their press, and how easily its feelings are hurt. They clung to the thought that this would soon be over.

Suddenly, such a fearful din arose as drowned out even the noise on deck. Tugboats (Continued on page 101)

BY FAITH SERVICE

THE CUSTOMARY crowd of fans stood outside the Four Star Theatre here in Hollywood the night "Firefly" was premiered and a new star was born. They stood on soap boxes, on camp stools brought from home. They shinnied up each others' backs, they crawled on each others' shoulders, the better to see the stars, my dear. They elbowed, shoved, jostled, waved autograph albums, made personal remarks such as one does about the supposedly non-comprehending animals in the Zoo. Voices hissed, whispered, rose to shrill splinters of screams.

"Boyohboyohboy, there's Joan Crawford, ain't she sumpin'. There's Loretta Young with Tyrone Power, thought he was goin' with Janet Gaynor now. Look, there's Warren William, he's in the pitcher, too. Say, where's Jeanette? Aw, she's on her honeymoon, don't you know anything? Say, is that Garbo or is it Shirley Temple?" So it went. And no one paid much heed to a quiet young man who went in with Irene Hervey on his arm. There were murmurs of, "Say, there's Irene Hervey. Who's she with? Oh, yeah, he was in 'A Day At The Races,' huh?" That was all.

Then the preview was over. The fans, more patient and persistent than the seven-day marathon dancers, still seethed and shoved. By the mysterious agency which seems to vibrate in the air waves and announce, without words, the rising of a new star, the word had passed. It was on the lips of the preview audience as they came out. It was on the elated faces of Producer Hunt Stromberg, Director Robert Leonard. It was in the congratulatory handshakes of his fellow players. For the quiet, almost unnoticed young man named Allan Jones would be quiet nevermore, would never again go unnoticed. Allan Jones came out of that theatre, figuratively if not literally, carried on the shoulders of his peers, besieged by the very fans who had passed him by as he went in, hosannaed by the audience who had applauded his songs to the last echo, cheered him in his final fade-out.

"Jeeze," bleated one of the crowd, one of the chronically envious for whom fame is always something to be envied, never to be earned, "jeeze, how's that for easy does it? One pitcher and the guy's in the Big Time. Jeeze!"

"Easy does it?" Ah, no, my friend.

Daniel Jones, father of Allan (an only child), was a slate picker in the coal mines of Pennsylvania when he was eight years old. His people had pulled the hardy fibres of their family tree out of the soil of Wales and transplanted the lusty shrub to the Land of Promise, America, Scranton, Pa. In Scranton, on October fourteenth, Allan was born.

Allan was four when Daniel realized that, a miner with neither stocks, bonds, annuities nor social position to bequeath his son, he had yet provided him with an "inherited income." For Daniel's fine tenor voice was born again in his son. "The Welsh," Allan told me, "are like the Italians in one thing, they sing as naturally as they breathe. They sing at their work and at their play. My father sang with coal dust in his lungs, down in the bowels of the earth. I sang, too. I sang before I could talk. I sang at my play. I sang while I ate. And when I was four I sang my first song in public. I stood up in church and gave them 'All Through the Night.'"

It took "The Firefly" to make movie moguls and fans realize what a gem they had in Allan Jones. Above, Allan with his wife, Irene Hervey, and her little girl, Gail.

When he was eight, young Allan had a regular church position, as boy soloist of St. Luke's Episcopal Church in Scranton. He took lessons from a local teacher twice a week. He took a few piano lessons when the family exchequer allowed. And wise in the way the sons of workingmen are wise, he knew that a voice was not enough; that he could sing in the mines as his father before him for the rest of his life but that if he would sing in opera as men like Caruso, Scotti, Rubini had done, training would have to be superimposed on nature. And training meant money. And money, in young Allan's language, was something you earned. And so he did. The "easy does it" of Allan Jones is the sweat of his body, the strain of his heart and muscles, rigorous deprivations, strenuous labors, almost all work and no play.

At the age of eleven he was working in Silverberg's Clothing Store in Scranton, delivering suits. He worked, after school, from three-thirty in the afternoons to "any old time at night." He earned ten dollars a week and trolley tickets. Even at that (Continued on page 89)

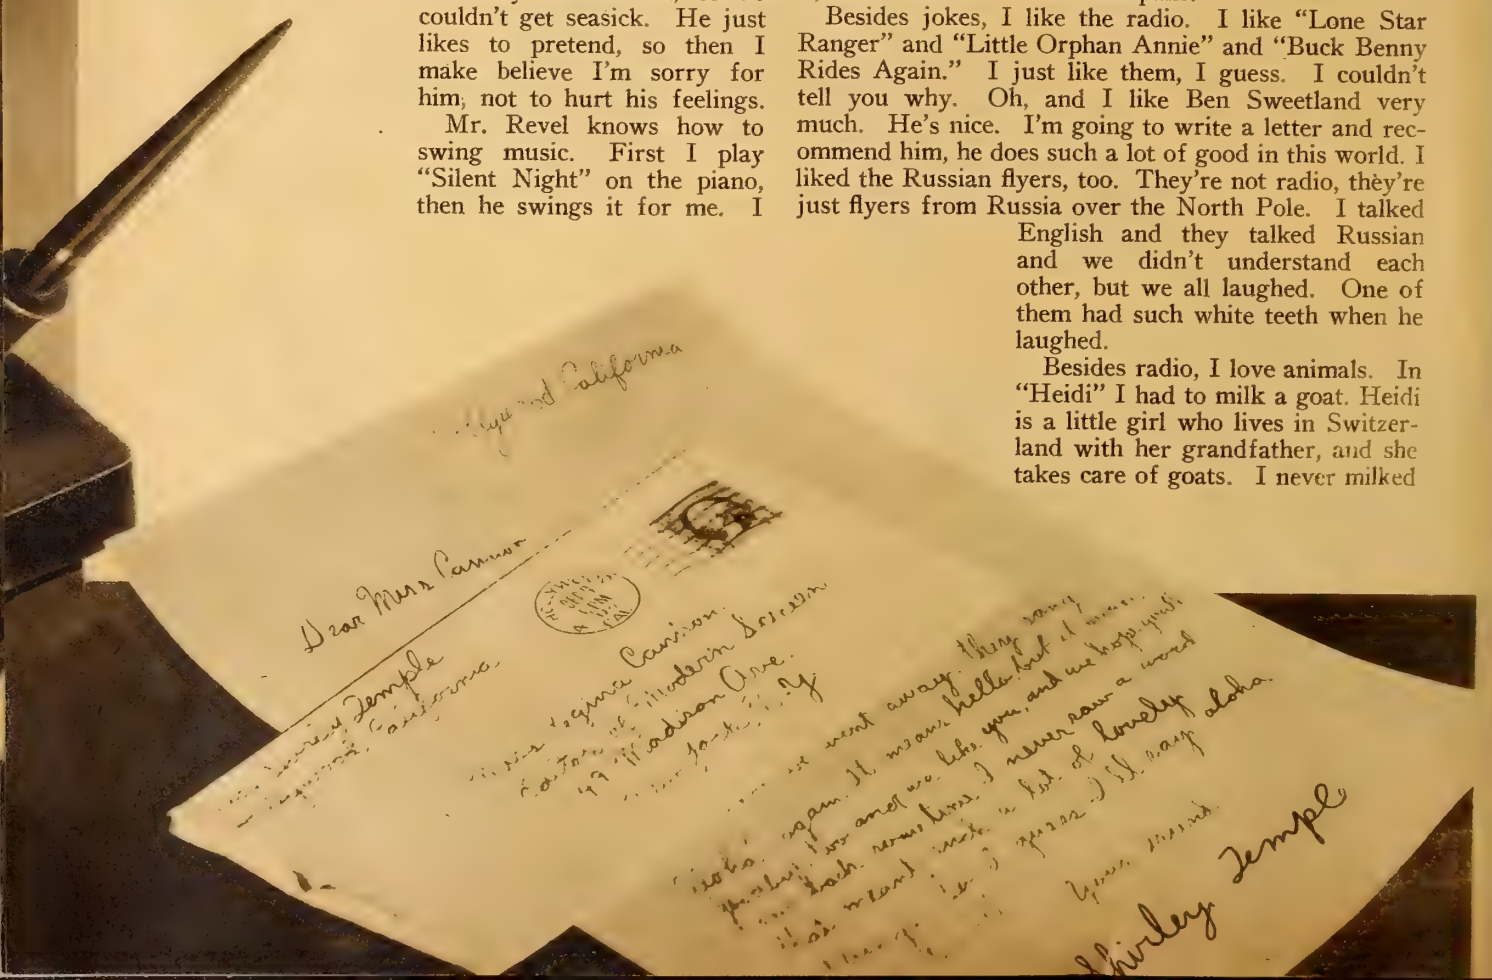
A LETTER FROM

I'M WRITING this letter to everybody who reads it. I'm not really writing it with a pencil. I'm saying it, and the lady is putting it down. That's how my daddy and Mr. Zanuck and other gentlemen do when they have an office. I have no office, but I like it anyway. When you write, it takes longer, and the spelling isn't so good, but when you talk, the words just come out and the lady spells them.

I'm eight years old and my name is Shirley Temple, and I play in pictures for Mr. Zanuck at the studio. It's a nice studio, because everybody laughs and makes jokes with me. I like jokes.

I have a little house there and Mr. Revel has the house next door. Mr. Revel writes songs with Mr. Gordon and he plays with me. He puts a lampshade on his head, and he holds an electric light in his hand, and then I hide, and he makes believe he's a lamp and he's looking for me. My goodness, how I laugh! Because it's funny to see a lamp with a coat on, walking up and down.

HE SINGS rounds with me, too. Do you know rounds? You start, and then somebody else starts, and you're all singing different things at the same time, but you mustn't miss. There's one round, "Row, row, row your boat, gently down the stream, merrily, merrily, merrily, merrily, life is but a dream." Mr. Revel never misses, but sometimes he says, "We'll have to stop this boat, I'm getting seasick." Of course, there isn't any boat at all, so he couldn't get seasick. He just likes to pretend, so then I make believe I'm sorry for him, not to hurt his feelings.



Mr. Revel knows how to swing music. First I play "Silent Night" on the piano, then he swings it for me. I take piano lessons from Miss Chaudet, but I don't think I'll ever play as good—I mean, as well—as Mr. Revel. When I know my lesson, I get a gold star, and when I have ten gold stars, I get a little statue of Wagner or Liszt. Pretty soon I'll have a whole list of them. That's a joke.

Would you like me to tell you another joke? Then you can tell it to somebody else. You say to them, "Spell two kinds of two," and they spell it. Then you say, "Spell the name of the man who wrote 'Tom Sawyer,'" and they spell it. Then you say, "Now say all those words," and they say, "Two two twain," as if they were a baby and didn't know how to pronounce choo choo train. Then you say, "When you grow up, I'll teach you how to say locomotive." It's funny, because they're mostly grown up already.

DO YOU know what a deadpan is? It's trying not to laugh when somebody tells you a joke. My daddy and I practiced it one day, and the next day somebody told me a joke. This is it. A girl who never saw a cow before saw one, and she said, "What are those things on his head?" And they said, "Horns." Well, pretty soon the cow mooed, and the girl said, "Which horn did it blow?" I wanted to laugh, but I didn't. I made my face straight, like Daddy showed me. The poor man looked so sad. He said, "Well, I thought it was funny, but I guess I'm wrong." His face kept looking more and more disappointed, so finally I couldn't stand it, and I told him about deadpans.

Besides jokes, I like the radio. I like "Lone Star Ranger" and "Little Orphan Annie" and "Buck Benny Rides Again." I just like them, I guess. I couldn't tell you why. Oh, and I like Ben Sweetland very much. He's nice. I'm going to write a letter and recommend him, he does such a lot of good in this world. I liked the Russian flyers, too. They're not radio, they're just flyers from Russia over the North Pole. I talked English and they talked Russian and we didn't understand each other, but we all laughed. One of them had such white teeth when he laughed.

Besides radio, I love animals. In "Heidi" I had to milk a goat. Heidi is a little girl who lives in Switzerland with her grandfather, and she takes care of goats. I never milked

Life is just one big joke after another to Shirley, so she seldom gets mad. But when she does, she does it in Chinese! You'll be seeing her in "Heidi."

a goat before. It wasn't quite easy, but finally I got some, and I had to laugh, because it came squirting out all over my hands, and the goat looked surprised. I wiped them off, and did it over again, because I was Heidi, you see, and Heidi wouldn't get it all over her hands.

There was something else I never did before, and that was yodeling. In the story Heidi goes for a drink of water, and she sees a man with a feather in his hat and he yodels, so she yodels, too. I tried to make it sound like the man with the feather, because he yodeled something beautiful, but it sounded pretty different, I can tell you. Well, anyway, Heidi wasn't experienced in yodeling, so I guess maybe it doesn't matter so much.

Oh, and there was the sweetest baby goat, his eyes were so blue. He was only four days old, just imagine that. Four days before he wasn't even born yet, and now he was working. He was Heidi's pet, and I had to hold him in my arms so he'd get used to me and wouldn't be frightened. I loved to hold him, he was so sweet and soft. And you know what? He got to like me. Really he did. Wasn't that wonderful? But, shucks, I guess the director didn't think so, because after a while he was supposed to run away from me, and he wouldn't run, he wanted to stay with me. So they had to get another one. I'm glad I didn't see him to say goodbye, because I might have cried.

I don't cry very much, just once in a while, like when Ching was run over. Ching is my dog, but they saved his life in the hospital, and he's fine now, thank you. He comes to the studio with me every day. Anyhow, I hope that little baby goat has a nice home, with plenty of grass.

Did you know some animals don't care so much for grass? F'rinstance, my rabbit, Blackie, eats pine needles. You'd think they'd (Continued on page 71)

Little Miss Temple speaks her piece while the lady puts it down

Rochelle claims you've got her wrong—and here proceeds to set you right

BY LOIS SVENSRUD

If her studio puts one more ruffly, girly-girly costume on Rochelle Hudson, she vows she's going to scuh-ream! How do you like this exotic get-up?

M'LADY—MINUS MAKE-UP

Rochelle started her career at fourteen and has been doing all right ever since. Here she is in "Look Out, Mr. Moto," with Robert Kent.

HOOKING RUGS my hobby?" Rochelle Hudson exhaled a derisive puff of smoke. Laughter filled her eyes. "Hooking men is my hobby!"

But her gray eyes darkened again as she leaned across the table and banged one small fist on it for emphasis. "You know, I'm fed up with this whole idea that people have of me—that I'm like all those be-ruffled, sweet young things I play on the screen. I think if one more ruffle comes into my life I'll scuh-ream!"

She drew a deep breath. "And I'm sick and tired of having people think I spend my evenings doing things like hooking rugs with the girls. In the first place, the only friends I have in this town are men. I've had only one close girl friend in my life—and we broke up at the age of seven over a boy."

Whew! Was this the Rochelle Hudson we had seen so often on the screen? This fascinating, self-assured young person? We hadn't exactly expected Rochelle to romp into the commissary in a playsuit, but certainly something more school-girlish than this sleekly fitted dress, knowing little hat and silver fox furs, seemed in order. Not only were they the *n*th degree of sophistication, but they suited their wearer to the same degree!

"Don't you like women?" we managed, groping for something to cover our surprise.

"They don't like me," said Rochelle bluntly. "As a matter of fact, women interest me so little that I can't even think of anything to say to them. Why, I've lived next door to Alice Faye for two years, and we've hardly said 'Hello' in that time. When I'm around girls I have to work every minute—around men I can barge right in and enjoy myself. Furthermore," she continued, "women don't trust me. They don't trust me because I prefer the company of men and don't make any bones about it.

"It's been my experience that men make more interesting and far more dependable friends than women. But most women can't understand how a member of their sex can be looking for friendship, not romance, in the opposite sex. Of course," and Rochelle's laughter bubbled out this time, "if romance follows, that's all right with me, too!"

"Perhaps women don't trust you because you might seem to prefer the company of their men?" we ventured.

"If you mean I go out gunning for their men—no, not by any means!" she said, decisively. "But," there was a mischievous gleam in her eyes, "if one comes within my line of vision, I certainly don't act like I'm seeing Hamlet's ghost. Besides, it seems to me that any woman not clever enough to hold her man should be a good sport when she loses him. And I speak with authority on that subject, having lost plenty in my day."

Now anyone who's been around Hollywood or even Podunk Center has heard or read enough in the movie columns to know that the Hudson girl rates ace-high with the gentlemen in this town, so the last remark left us dubious.

"Oh, it's true all right," Rochelle reassured. "Take the most recent case—that of Rochelle Hudson vs. Johnny Eldredge. We'd been having a simply swell time together until recently when Johnny decided that Olivia de Havilland was the nicest gal in town.

"And oh, yes!" she went on reminiscently, "that reminds me of another case. Just before Johnny went 'de Havilland,' he gave a dinner party at the Trocadero for some of his friends. I found myself sitting next to Ronald Burla. We were both surprised, to say the least, since it's the (Continued on page 73)

MONTGOMERY IN A MELLOW MOOD

BY CAROLINE S. HOYT

SAID BOB, "If I should tell you what I'm really like, you'd be bored to death. If you should write what I tell you, your readers would be bored to death."

I said, "I'll gamble on myself and on my readers. Tell me."

"I'm just a man who wants to improve himself on his job," said Bob gravely. "I'm an actor who wants to become a better actor. I'm a business man who hopes for promotion. Meaning, in my case, better stories. I am no different from the banker who studies economics in order to 'raise' himself, no different from the doctor who studies his glandular systems and bio-chemistry, experiments and observes with the ambition of bettering his technique, his knowledge of his subject. I'm an actor who wants to develop into a better actor. And works at it. All of the time."

Which statement didn't bore me. Nor surprise me, either. I have always known that Bob is not, really, the casual, wise-cracking smart young sophisticate he has for so long and so consistently appeared to be on the screen. For Bob is a crusader at heart. He is a breaker of lances. He can turn a nifty phrase with the best of the cocktail bar sophisticates. He can also spit forth iron indignations. He can flirt. He can also fight. He is raw to any injustice, any wrongs of his people. He is, invariably if not always popularly, on the side of the oppressed, the put-upon. Much as is Jimmy Cagney, one of his good friends. Together, they've waged many a battle.

Make no mistakes about Bob. If you have been mistaken about him, let me help you rectify your misapprehension. Bob has a slick patter, off the screen as well as on, true. He even seems a "tech" mad now and again. He is debonair and sleek and suave. He loves to play, occasionally. On the surface. But his mind is like one of those powerful, intricate motors concealed beneath the streamlined, shining hood of a very expensive car. There is speed and a silken murmur. And you do not realize, at first, the power, the steel strength of the engine because of the "lines" and the paint job.

Bob wears a slick paint job. It's deceiving. The superficials are all gay and glib and in the mode moderne. But the powerful engine of the Montgomery brain, the hot strong motives of the Montgomery heart are all there. There is little of philosophy, psychology, matters politic or sociological, that Bob has not read and studied. He is Duco-ed with the drawing room manner. He might, superficially, seem to fit in with the Hemingways, the Noel Cowards, all the Bright Young People. But he can, also, hold his own with scientists, engineers, medical men, learned professors.

There is no family in the film colony more conservative, more decorously mannered, less exhibitionistic than the young Montgomerys. Unless it be the young Fred Astaires. There is a screen over the private life of the Montgomerys behind which neither public nor press ever peeks. Bob will not talk, for publication, about his wife or the babies. Their friends are the Chester Morrises, the Fred Astaires, the Fredric Marches, the Leslie Howards, others.

When they are at home on their farm in New York State, they live the quiet, unobtrusive lives of country gentlefolk. They ride to hounds. They go to football games. They wear old, tweedy clothes, sweaters a bit shapeless, ancient and honorable raccoon coats, walking boots. They sip a little sherry, dry, before dinner. The children go to Sunday school and are brought in, for dessert, after dinner.

Bob's interests, his real interests, are not vested in cocktail shakers, dizzy parties on the blue rim of Hollywood swimming pools (as so many of his pictures would indicate), nor yet in wise-cracks. I have talked with Bob for an hour, two, three hours and not a wise-crack flips off his lips.

Bob's real interests are in heavy matters. Such as Guild shops for actors and writers, the promotion of better working conditions for every member of his profession, beginning with extras. He advocates a home, a hospital, down Santa Monica way where the sea breezes blow, for indigent, ailing actors. He says, "The survivors of the well-known fittest should help the unfit to survive. This is the only humane law for all human beings."

He is interested in providing for old-timers in pictures, old-timers who want work and can't get it. He believes in keeping green (and well-fed) the memories of those who, in the past, have made us laugh and cry and forget. He would like, by publicity and persuasion, to build the loyalty of the American public for stars who have aged or faded.

He is against censorship of all kinds. And does things about it even though it might well be to his own interest to stop doing things about such things.

He cares about working hours for actors, the limitation of working hours. He would like to establish the fact that actors are not cans of soup nor automotive parts to be run through machines, neatly labelled and so ready for the ultimate consumer.

He believes that actors should be temperamental if their natures so dictate. "For the actor," said Bob, "should have temperament. It is what gives him phfft! It is the throb in the song. It is the color on the canvas. It is the stir in the blood. I would encourage temperament if I had anything to say about it. I believe that Oscar Wilde once said that women only take lovers for the scenes they make. Well, if I were a producer I would take actors for the off-scene scenes they make!"

Man-about-town? That's what you think—but here's a surprising new slant on our fine friend Robert

What to do next? That's the problem Bob's trying to solve these days. So how will you have your Montgomery, gay and debonair or serious and dramatic? He wants to know.

He cares terribly about his work, does Bob Montgomery. He cares, not only and exclusively, about his own work, however, but he cares about the screen as a potent and powerful medium of ever bigger and better things.

He said, "There is no art form in the world today, neither stage, nor radio, nor literature, nor sculpture, which embraces the whole world and everything in it as pictures do, or could do. For the screen can command the earth and all of the arts and science, engineering, literature, great personalities, the past, the present, even the future are at the beck and call of the Great God Studio. I believe that we have been playing down to the public.

"When we previewed 'Night Must Fall' I asked that the first preview be shown at a little hick town here in California. A community of farmers, ranchers and their wives. The kind of people who cook a big family dinner, clear away, wash up, sigh and say, 'Let's go to the movies tonight.' They were the people who first saw 'Night Must Fall.' I was there with Dick Thorpe, the director. We were having the jitters. I said to Dick, 'This will decide it. We will know tonight whether we were right or wrong, whether we have succeeded or failed.' And you could have heard a pin drop there in that crowded little theatre. And when they came out they came up to me, men and women I'd never seen before and may never see again, and they shook hands with me and the words they didn't say made me know that they had 'got' it, that we had succeeded. It proved what I have always contended, that people do not go to the movies with their minds. They go with their emotions. And emotions are all and basically the same, whether they live in the heart of an illiterate farm-hand or the heart of a polished cosmopolite

DIETRICH GOES LIGHT-HEARTED?

Tch, tch, perish the thought, shudders sultry Marlene, who would rather be mysterious than Duchess of Windsor! Well, why not?

BY JAMES REID

IT'S ALL very well to speak of Miss Dietrich's legs. They are very beautiful. And they haven't been a detriment to her. Maybe they've even helped her a little bit, but . . .

"So far, too many of Miss Dietrich's roles have been too much alike. Exotic manners, enchanting smiles, dreamy eyes, and—the legs.

"She has something else, something we are going to show in her next picture: a talent for comedy which the public knows little about."

So said Ernst Lubitsch, firing the first gun in the publicity campaign for "Angel," starring Marlene Dietrich, directed by Mr. Lubitsch.

And his statement, which was much broader than it was long, started something. A rumor that Marlene was going light-hearted. A suspicion that she was weary of being an Exotic Enigma, sultry in a sombre way, or, if you prefer, sombre in a sultry way.

If Marlene, who has gone to so much trouble to change her personality, is now going in for an unexpected change, it is news. News worthy of explanation. And if she isn't wearying of the Exotic Enigma business, that, perhaps, is news.

Whichever is true, she should be willing to answer a few questions, to establish the truth. Even if she doesn't have much use for interviews any more.

It is difficult sometimes, but I still can remember when she was not always thus.

I can remember when she was a contradiction of practically everything that she seems to be today.

I can remember when she first arrived from Germany, the new-found discovery of Director Josef von Sternberg, and Paramount gave a huge party to introduce her to the Press.

The Press was more impressed with the party than by the guest of honor.

She was pretty, in a round-faced, wide-eyed way. But wasn't she a bit—er—plump? At least, the frills and ruffles that she wore gave that impression. If she had glamor, it was the glamor of youthful freshness, not of seductive sophistication and poise. She was nervously self-conscious. She was obviously awed by Hollywood. She was almost pathetically eager to be friendly.

The writers, that day, had a vague impression of a pretty German hausfrau, amazed to find herself in this strange new world.

Paramount publicized her as the last word in exoticism, and the writers wondered what Paramount was talking about. Until they saw "Morocco." Then it was their turn to be amazed.

Here was no pretty hausfrau, self-conscious and timid. Here was a dazzling, daring creature, exotically mysterious, impelling seductive, such an "attractress" that it didn't much matter whether or not she was a great actress.

Writers clamored for interviews. And Marlene, flattered by the clamoring, eagerly granted them. Grateful for friendliness from these strangers who could do her so much good, she was friendly in return.

But the writers, who were willing to admit that their first impression had been wrong, and were prepared to be startled now, came away with amazing stories. Not stories about a woman with an exotic, mysterious past. Not stories about the secrets of attracting men. But stories that painted her as still a hausfrau at heart. Stories (Continued on page 82)

BY VIRGINIA WOOD

A tense moment from "The Adventures of Marco Polo." Gary, in the title role, bids farewell to his princess, played by Sigrid Gurie. But he promises he'll be back. And who could blame him, after taking one look at the beauteous Sigrid?

GETTING THE BREAKS

IF GARY COOPER hadn't been forced to spend a couple of years on his father's Montana ranch when he was a kid, if he had followed his father's law profession, if he had landed a job as cartoonist on a newspaper, he probably would never have become an actor.

Unlike most of the present-day stars, the idea of taking up acting had never occurred to Gary. When he came to Los Angeles, with his sketch-book under his arm, Gary wanted nothing more than to get a job as cartoonist on some newspaper. And even this ambition was not a driving passion. The only reason he thought of sketching was because he had a flair for drawing and had had a smattering of newspaper training back in Helena, Montana, after he left college.

Gary wasn't even interested in acquiring great wealth. All he really wanted out of life was a small car (hopped up for racing), enough money to eat on and possibly rent a horse to ride occasionally. Outside of that, the only thing he honestly longed for was a real handsome saddle.

At any rate, after a long, hard siege of looking for jobs, just doing anything, when he was finally called into the casting office to work in a western picture, which meant riding a horse and getting paid for it, Gary at first couldn't imagine what had happened. He was sure there was something phoney about a business which paid people for doing the things they thought were fun. But he had no choice in the matter. He'd spent too many days living on crackers and milk to ask questions.

And then, when those same crazy people chose him out of two hundred extras to play the role of Abe Lee in "The Winning of Barbara Worth," just because he was tall and lanky, Gary was convinced they were all nuts. A modest gent, to say the least.

"Why, any of those extras could have played the part as well as I," Gary remarked one day while we were chatting on the set of "Marco Polo." "Gosh, I couldn't act at all, still can't." Gary blushed a little and smiled that crooked smile of his.

"It was just the break I got that landed me in pictures, no matter what you say. The way I look at it is if I hadn't happened to be there at that particular moment, I probably wouldn't have been cast in the picture at all and some other guy would have been lucky instead."

To say that Gary is modest would be silly. Gary doesn't know what the word "modest" means, at least, as applied to himself. He's so darned humble and honest about himself he still, to this day, doesn't believe he has a thing any other guy hasn't. Screen personality? Gary thinks that's a lot of poppycock. To his mind, anyone could do any of the things he's accomplished on the screen and be successful if he's given the same breaks.

Yet in spite of this lack of confidence in his own knowledge and ability, Gary has an uncanny intuition about his roles and the pictures in which he appears. You never hear Gary express the opinion, as so many actors do, that a part isn't "right" for him or criticize a script because it doesn't suit his own ideas. But occasionally, at the most unexpected moments, possibly when he's half completed a film, Gary will pop out with some unexpected remark like, "Picture's no good," or "It'll be a hit." Outside of that, you'd never hear him complain. He just goes on, doing the best he can, without comment.

Gary isn't even what you might call a self-made man. If anyone was ever literally kicked up the ladder of success, that person is "Coop." Gary never even looked for a ladder, in the first place. (Continued on page 98)

Gary Cooper admits it's luck and not pluck that gets you there

THIRD BEGINNING

Anna May Wong is back again—er, pardon us—beginning again in a series of detective stories, the first of which is "Daughter of Shanghai."

BY ROBERT McILWAINE

It's an old Chinese custom for a talented girl to return to the scene of her success

ANNA MAY WONG is not staging a comeback, American style. She is beginning a movie career—for the third time. Yes, Anna May and her make-up box are parked on the Paramount lot, where she is playing in "Daughter of Shanghai," the first of a series in which she is to portray a lady detective.

Paramount is making the pictures, not due to the current conflict in the Orient, but because of the tremendous success of those Charlie Chan features. To begin at the beginning—which is just as good a place as any to start—the idea is new to the studio, if not to Anna May Wong. You see, she offered it to them three years ago, when they didn't think it worth while. However, recently our heroine was speaking to one of the Big Boys on the lot. She asked him which of two other companies would be better to handle the series.

"Hey, what about us?" he demanded.

"But, I didn't think you would be interested in anything exotic, with Miss Dietrich on the lot," replied the very modest Miss Wong.

It appears that they were, for Anna May is back, as we've said, in the throes of her—Third Beginning!

YOU SEE, my movie life has really been divided into three distinct parts," Anna May explained. "The first period was taken up with my struggle to win recognition. After that was accomplished I got into sort of a rut, neither progressing nor being retarded. You know, there are so few roles that I can play and at the time they seemed to be always small ones.

"The result was that I had to stretch my salary over the lean weeks when I had no assignments. Well, just at this time, along came an offer to go to Europe and I accepted promptly.

"In Germany, they wrote stories for me and I became a star. This achievement, I consider my Second Beginning, for I went from there to London and was successful in films as well as on the stage. After finishing there, I returned to America where my picture progress once again seemed at a standstill, until recently when my Third Beginning got under way."

There is no one more qualified to portray Chinese characters than Anna May Wong, even though she isn't Chinese. Just a moment, you incredulous, who take for granted that Anna May comes from the land of cherry blossoms and lotus flowers. When first this little "Oriental" saw light of day, she opened her eyes on nothing more exotic than the palm trees of our own California. What's more, she never set foot on Chinese soil until a year ago. Yep, Anna May is an American (Continued on page 80)

I'M off on a different tack this month. I hope you won't feel cheated if I do an article on personality and give the beauty hints the go-by to a great extent. I'll find space for a coupla beauty notions toward the end, so hush, and listen to what I have to say.

The title speaks the truth: Personality is better than beauty. Personality can get places where beauty finds locked doors. Personality plus beauty is, of course, an unbeatable combination and those who have it don't need my help. But personality with only moderate good looks —or personality, even, accompanied by downright physical plainness is far, far more to be desired, my fellow countrywomen, than Dumb Dora beauty alone. Personality—its development and expression—demands gray matter, chic, talent, perseverance and a good heaping cupful of courage. It often needs a little help to bring it out. I'd like to help.

You've heard people say of a girl you know, "Have you seen her lately? Why, she's a different person! So attractive, my dear. And remember what a mousey little thing she used to be?" Bette Davis' True Life Story— A girl's rise to stardom through sheer determination

By Gladys Hall

Camera-wise even at the tender age of five months! Looking right at the birdie, no doubt, Bette poses informal like, with her Ma.

Papa Davis doesn't seem to share Bette's two-year-old enthusiasm over this one. That's little sister, Bobbie, on the left. Some hats, what?

A SMALL, fair-haired child of four years stood over her smaller sister, shears in hand. With grim deliberation she cut off every strand and curl of the little sister's pretty hair. Then, as her mother's horrified face appeared in the doorway, the four-year-old exclaimed triumphantly, "Now she isn't going to be pretty. She isn't going to be pretty any more!"

A problem child.

At the age of three this same infant would jump up and down, point to an infinitesimal wrinkle, a barely discernible spot on her clean gingham dress and cry, with rage and revulsion, "Take it off! Take it off!" Which her mother, feeling that this passion for cleanliness denoted feminine daintiness, encouraged.

Yes, a problem child, laughs the mother of Bette Davis today. But a problem only to those who were in intimate contact with her, who could watch her strange little habits and characteristics come out of their covets. So far as any outsider could tell, she was a plain, quiet little thing, with pale hair, pale eyes, pale skin, kinda skinny, with nothing to say for herself. She was, superficially, a most unexciting little girl. She gave no promise of any sort.

In the New England town of Lowell, Massachusetts, where Bette, christened Ruth Elizabeth, was born, not a person could have been made to believe that "the little Davis girl" would ever become an actress. An actress? Fantastic! Why the poor little thing was as plain as a pipestem, didn't say "boo" for herself, didn't even have that provocative thing called "personality," that promising thing called "precocity." She didn't even speak little pieces for company, like some little girls did. Besides, people like the Favors and the Davises didn't produce play-actresses. Such didoes were not in the staid New England blood. Yes, the good Lowellites would certainly have pooh-poohed any such preposterous prophecy, had any such been made. None was.

An hour or two after Ruth Elizabeth was born her young aunt, her mother's sister, made the first recorded comment ever made about Bette Davis. She stood looking down on the delicate, five and three-quarter-pound atom, whose hold on life seemed so thread-frail, and she murmured, "Too bad, too bad."

Probably only Ruth Davis, the mother, with her gift of "second sight," suspected from the first that the pale, quiet surface of her first-born masked banked fires and hidden furies and forces, not frail at all.

For Mrs. Davis will tell you, "Bette never could control herself. Always, too, she had to be the center of everything or she wouldn't play. In small ways, she would give in pleasantly enough. Because she didn't care. But what she really cared about she fought for, from the first. For those who believe in astrology, Bette is an Aries child, born on the fifth of April. She was, as Aries people are supposed to be, always intolerant of criticism. She is still. Criticize anything she does, or plans to do, and she will seem to pay no attention at all, to shrug the criticism off, resentfully. In the end, she always accepts it and usually acts upon it.

"Her one outstanding trait, as a child, was her neatness, which was a positive passion. And it grew into a complex, a monomania, which Bette is, only now, beginning to outgrow. She will tell you that her house looks, always, as though she were just about to move! Rugs being cleaned, drapes being cleaned, bureau drawers turned out. When she has guests, she will watch them with eagle eyes, pounce upon an ash-tray the instant it has been used, and clean it out, plump up cushions even as guests are relaxing on them. She will go over things with a dust cloth and, five minutes later, go over the same surfaces again.

"But I think," laughed Bette's mother, "that she is in the process of being cured. Only the other night a guest in her house walked out of it, saying, 'You may keep your house spotless, Bette, but I am leaving.' She had cleaned an ash-tray, plumped up a cushion, straightened a rug under a guest's feet once too often."

BETTE'S maternal grandparents were French. They came to this country with the Huguenots during the Persecution and settled in New England, where, in one locale or another, all of Bette's forebears on both sides lived.

The family name, on the maternal side, was, originally, Le Fevre. Later it was Anglicized and became Favour; finally, in the present generation, plain Favor. Bette, when she first went on the stage, considered using her mother's maiden name. She rejected the idea because she felt that people would believe it a made-up name. Bette Favor. "Too literary," decided Bette, "too fictional."

On both sides of the family there were lawyers, ministers, doctors. Bette's maternal great-grandfather was an inventor. He invented, among other things, the first sewing machine. He did not, I believe, market this invention. But it was used by the women of his family. Bette's maternal grandfather was a civil engineer. Her paternal grandfather was the president of a Southern college, also a minister. On both sides were the strains of the stern Calvinists, the Puritan tradition.

Ruth Elizabeth Favor and Harlow Morrell Davis met when, as children, they spent their summer vacations in Maine. They met every summer throughout their childhoods. Neither ever went with any other girl or boy. And while Harlow Davis, a graduate of Bates College in Maine, was still finishing his studies at Harvard Law, the young couple were married in Lowell, Massachusetts, in the home of Ruth Elizabeth's parents. And there, in the yellow clapboard house in which her mother had been born, on a chill April morning when the iron New England winter was giving way, grudgingly, to the first pastel pushings and prongs of spring, Ruth Elizabeth, and eighteen months later, her small sister, Barbara, were born.

THERE WAS little to distinguish Bette's first eight years from the first eight years of any proper little girl in a proper New England town. Bette and Bobbie were brought up to mind their manners, say their prayers, respect their elders, curtsey to guests. They went to the village school; they attended Sunday school wearing their "best dresses." They were taught the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule. Grandmother Favor drilled them in the way things were done "when I was a girl."

Perhaps the only "different" element in the conventional pattern of their days was their mother. She was "ahead of the times." She loosed the girdle of the New England repressions wherever and as often as she could. Long before the little girls wore bloomers with their gingham dresses, Ruth Davis made bloomers for her small daughters. She knew that they would kick up their coltish legs; she even knew that they had legs (oh, pioneer!) and made allowance and provision for same. She was, also, frank with them. She was gay and humorous and casual and companionable. She became their friend almost in the same hour she became their mother. Bette was to be very grateful for this in the years to come.

Demure was the word for Bette when this was taken. But even in those days she dreamed of becoming an actress and, with Bette, that meant it was as good as done.

Bette, as a child, never cared for dolls; never, so far as her mother can remember, played with a doll at all. She never had a "best girl friend." She had no hobbies. She did not collect stamps, press flowers, monograms, scraps for patchwork quilts. She ran with the pack or played by herself. And from the time she could hold a book in her hand, she read. She read everything. She read the books of Louisa M. Alcott. She read "The Five Little Peppers," the "Little Colonel" books. She read Grimm's Fairy Tales. And her mother read her the classics, Dickens, Scott, Bulwer-Lytton, Stevenson, Bret Harte.

When Bette was eight, her parents divorced. "We were sent to Florida that winter," Bette remembers. "When we came back, it was all over. There has been endless discussion, innumerable books and articles written about the 'children of divorce.' I can only know how it affected me. It didn't. Not at the time. That it affected all of my later life, there can be no doubt. For had my mother and father remained together I would never have gone on the stage. My father would not have approved. And by the time it would have been necessary for him to forbid it, I would have been beyond rebellion.

"The girdle of New England repression would have quite staved in my ribs. I would have grown up in New England, gone to college, married, no doubt, settled down and become an outwardly placid and contented housewife and mother, an inwardly frustrated and bitter woman. But at eight years of age I think I accepted the fact that it was better as it was.

"Bobbie, on the other hand, took it terribly to heart. She brooded over it and was miserable. Which certainly indicates that you can't hold blanket theories about how children of divorce are affected. It depends entirely on the individual child. I had been uncomfortable—I won't say unhappy, it wasn't as definite as that—by the sense that my mother was unhappy, that something was wrong. I didn't know what. That was part of my trouble. I always want to know what! When it was over, that was finality, and I always could, and still can, accept finality. We did not have to face the twisted problem of living part time with one parent, part time with the other. That's very bad. That's tearing and confusing. We didn't see our father again for many years.

"I do think that the children of divorced parents feel a little strange, a little different from other children. There must have been some self-consciousness about it in my mind, because I never once told anyone that my parents were divorced. I always evaded any talk about 'mama and papa.' I remember thinking, 'There is something funny about us.'"

WHEN THE children came back from Florida, the home in Lowell was dissolved and the former life was as though it had never been. Ruth Davis, always interested in photography, had decided to go to New York to study in order to make of her amateur ability a professional and money-making career. There would have been ample means, too. Harlow Davis provided sufficient alimony for his family to live quietly and with the ordinary comforts. But Ruth Davis wanted more than the ordinary comforts for her children. She wanted the extraordinary comforts and culture. She wanted travel and study and the best schools, all kinds of extra riches.

So, Ruth Davis went to New York. She placed Bette and Barbara in boarding school in the Berkshire Hills. And here Bette and Barbara lived and worked and studied until Bette was in her teens. It was a good life. The school was a farm and Bette learned to keep house, learned something of farm life, of growing things, of seasons, of the earth turning and the fruits it gives as it turns; learned the "facts of life" from the unabashed and so unsullied habits and matings of the animals.

"My childhood," Bette remembers, "was pretty much of a monotone. If I had any distinguishing emotion at all, it was that I was waiting for something. I didn't know at all what I was waiting for. I can't remember that I ever thought, much less said, that I would become an actress, a writer, an artist. I just sort of lived in a pleasant, static mist, reading, doing what was expected of me, punctuating this placid pattern with occasional rages when something I wanted penetrated the coma, and I fought for it. Even there I stuck pretty much to my own last. I didn't have a roommate because I didn't want one. I was the type who preferred a room of my own. I didn't have any confidantes. I played hockey and tennis with the others as part of the school curriculum. I hadn't then, I haven't now, any flair for athletics. I was an apt enough student. I never plugged. I never gave any very brilliant scholastic performance. I liked history and languages. I detested mathematics and, later, chemistry. I was an A student, I'd say, until my last two years in high school. Then I decided to rest on the oars of my past record and have some fun. But that was later on."

Bette was ten when the accident occurred. It is still referred to in the family as "the accident." The dreadful accident which so nearly made of Bette a charred mass, unrecognizable as a human being, for all of her life.

It occurred at Christmas time. Ruth Davis was, then, hostess-house-mother at Miss Bennett's School for Girls, at Milbrook, New Jersey. She could not, because of her duties, be with her children that Christmas.

At Bette's school they were having their school Christmas tree. Bette, dressed as a small Santa Claus, with red flannel suit, cuffs and collars of cotton wadding, was playing near the tree. A candle snuffed out. The child struck a match and relit the candle. The flame caught the easily inflammable cotton stuff. And when the flames were extinguished there was nothing but a blistering jelly where the child's face had been.

Bette says, "I think I displayed my first instinct for the dramatic then. For as the flames were put out I heard horrified exclamations all around me. I heard one of the teachers wail, 'She is blind! Oh, God, she is blind!' I didn't know whether I was blind or not. But I do remember feeling, with thrills and chills of morbid pleasure, that this was my moment, my big dramatic moment. And I deliberately kept my eyes tight closed, groped helplessly about with my hands, until the full savor of that moment was extracted."

Then there occurred one of those circumstances which cannot be explained, which never has been explained, to this day. No medical aid was given the child. She was not rushed to the nearby hospital. No doctor was called in. The resident nurse applied a few home remedies, scented cold cream being one of them. And then, with a teacher weepingly in charge, with the weather sub-zero, Bette was sent to New York on the train with a group of children going home for the holidays. The freezing cold, the cinders from the train, worked further havoc with the ravaged small face. And it was this unrecognizable face which the mother, summoned by telegram to meet the train, knowing that something had happened but not knowing what, was called upon to meet.

Ruth Davis will tell you today that she swore, for the first time in her life, when she looked upon what seemed to be the remains of her child. She swore such oaths, she says, as she didn't know then, and doesn't know now, how she ever knew at all. That frightful burn, that exposure to zero weather less than an hour after the accident occurred, the lack of medical attention, the trip on the train, hundreds of cinders embedded in the raw flesh, the terrified, weeping young teacher, Ruth Davis cursed it all.

BETTE," her mother tells, "proved then, that she can meet the big things in life like a thoroughbred. Whatever her faults, they do not include flinching in the face of catastrophe. Nor welching. For the first words the child said to me were, 'It was my fault, Mother, really it was. Miss W—— told me not to go near the Christmas tree."

Ruth Davis rushed the child to the nearest doctor. She thought, "He may tell me that she will live, he will surely tell me that she is maimed for life."

Bette says now, "I was too young to be worried about the possible loss of future beauty. I was still not in acute pain, that came later, and was still enjoying, little monster that I was, my first undisputed spotlight."

The doctor told Ruth Davis that there was one way of saving the child from permanent and horrible disfigurement. But it was an impossible way unless there could be a succession of nurses on the case. For the one way was to keep the burned areas moist, constantly, unremittingly moist, for fourteen days and nights. Every fifteen minutes for a fortnight, pads saturated with a boric solution would have to be applied to the burns. "It means," he told the mother, every bit as grim as he, "that you will have to stay awake, day and night, for fourteen days and nights. If you can do this the burns will not heal and form scar tissue, they will slough off and new skin will form. It is the only way. I don't believe you can do it."

Ruth Davis said, "I'll do it." And she did. She took Bette to Milbrook with her, at Miss Bennett's insistence. And there, keeping the child in her own bed, a bell tied to her wrist at night, the alarm clock set for every fifteen minutes, she swabbed those burns every fifteen minutes for fourteen days and fourteen nights. "I used," Mrs. Davis remembers now, "jars and jars of boric solution, barrels of bandages. Her hair was burned off, of course, and she wore wool caps with gauze underneath.

"Her suffering, after the first shock to the nerves, which anesthetized them, was horrible. For three months her eyes were red and inflamed. And this is curious, but it was after the burn that her eyes became large, as they are now. She never had eyes like that before the accident. I can't account for it, but there it is."

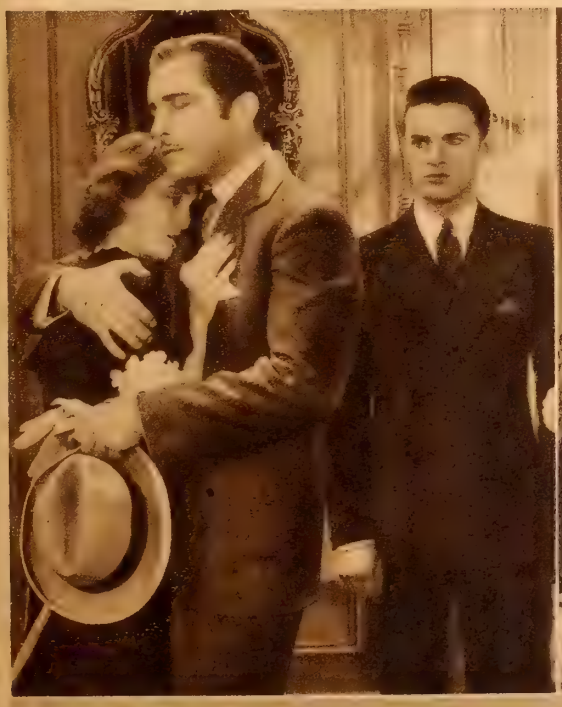
When, at long last, the burns were healed and the new, fair, unblemished skin had become a matter of miraculous fact, Ruth Davis did one of the most courageous and healthy things in a courageous career—she sent Bette back to the Berkshire Hills school. She felt that it was, psychologically, the sound thing to do. As there was to be no scar on the child's face, she wanted no scar on her memory; no place, no person who could, in the future, spell horror to her. The only way to efface a memory of horror was to build new memories over it, as new skin had been built over the burns. Bette went back to that school. And no scar tissue is left, either visible or invisible.

BETTE went, briefly, for one term, to the Northfield School. And then entered the Cushing Academy in Newton, Massachusetts. It was at Cushing that Bette was to fall in love. It was at Cushing that Bette first met Harmon Nelson. And it was at Cushing, too, that the formless dream which, like a hidden current, invisible even to her, but shaping the whole course of her life, began to take definite form and meaning. She was to find love, she was to find her career, she was to find herself.

It was not until Bette was between fourteen and fifteen that her looks changed. And little tendrils of beauty touched her pale hair with gold, her pale skin with richer cream and roses, her thin little body with delicate curves.

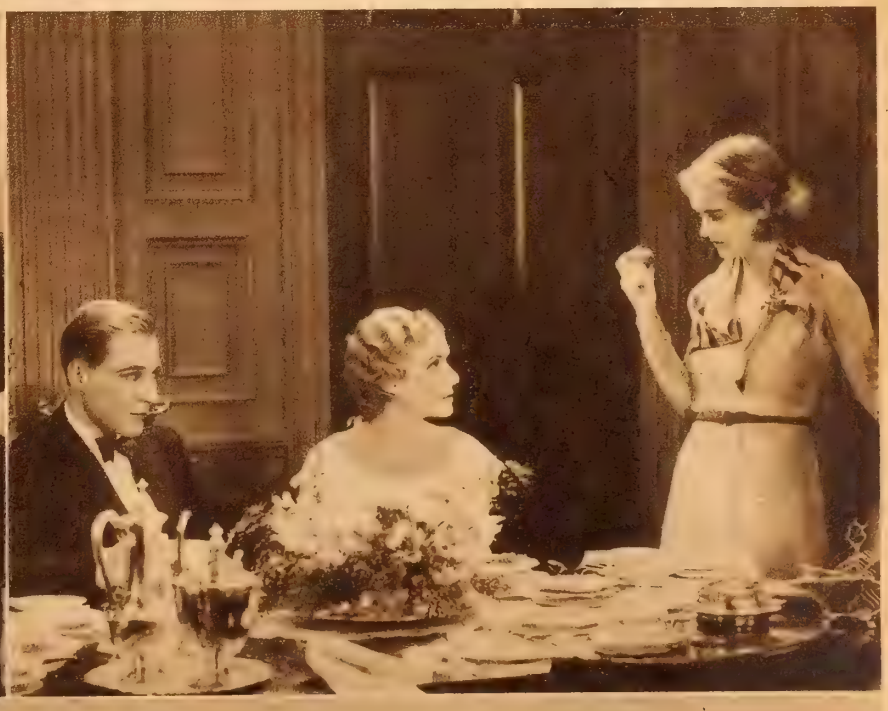
Bette tells you, "I was standing in front of a cheval mirror one evening while Mother tried on my first dinner dress. She had made it for me, daringly, with the neckline cut almost to the collar-bone! I also remember Grandmother Favor looking at me and saying, 'Ruth Elizabeth, you are not going to wear that where gentlemen can see you, are you?'

"Anyway, I remember looking at myself and wondering whether a stranger was standing there. I think it was the first time I ever really saw myself. Certainly it was the first time I was ever conscious of myself as a woman. I had been so plain. When I was around twelve or so I think even Mother gave me up. She used to braid my hair in two skin-tight braids as if she were saying that she just couldn't make any further effort to gild the limp lily, that there I was and what about it! I had skinny arms and legs, teeth every which-way, never knew what to say to people, couldn't get out a bleat when I was with a boy, oh, awful! But as I looked at myself in the mirror that night I exclaimed, 'My goodness, I think I'm quite pretty!' "



The miracle of the transfiguration must have been as obvious as flags flying, the gold and blue and white flags which were Bette's young beauty.

"For from the time Bette was fourteen," her mother told me, "boys were interested in her. We were boy-ridden. Wherever we were, wherever we lived, and we have lived in seventy-three houses, all told, boys swarmed in the living-room, in the garden, on all of the front porches! One despairing lad mooned about our house in Newton threatening the most ingenious methods of suicide for love of Bette."



But Ruth Davis was New England enough, perhaps with enough of the French prudence where les jeunes filles are concerned, to keep Bette pretty much a child until she was past sixteen. She was well past sixteen before ever she was allowed to go out with a boy alone.

It was on the occasion of one of Bette's dates that Ruth Davis gave her first demonstration of "second sight," a gift, if gift it be, she never suspected herself of possessing. Bette had gone, one night, to a dance at Pemaquid Point. It was summer and they were vacationing in Maine. Ruth Davis, knowing that she was with two boys, felt, she says, perfectly comfortable about her. But she always waited up until the girls came in, and it being a mild summer night, she thought she would take a walk, take in a movie while she waited.

She was watching the movie when, suddenly, as though a glass of iced water had deluged her, she broke out in an actual physical chill and felt the still more horrid chill of some formless but terrifying premonition. She cast a wild look around the darkened theatre and, in the row behind her, recognized a boy she knew, another friend of Bette's. Ruth Davis beckoned the youth to follow her. Outside, her voice hoarse, she begged him to take his car and go for Bette at once, at once. The lad, nothing loath, though considerably perplexed, drove the twenty miles to Pemaquid, told Bette her mother was very ill and needed her—he had to say something strong enough to make her leave with him—and brought her home.

Bette, of course, finding her mother perfectly well and feeling, by this time, a little foolish, was indignant.

"What," she demanded, "is this all about?"

Ruth Davis said, "I don't know."

Two hours later the phone rang. Ruth Davis answered it. She hung up the receiver and waited a long cold moment. Then she woke Bette and said, "The boys, the two boys you went to the dance with. Their car skidded and went over a cliff on the way home. They were killed."

THE FIRST day Bette attended class at Cushing Academy she saw Harmon Nelson. She says, "I liked him immediately. I think I liked him, at first, because he had such curious eyes, cold eyes promising warmth. Then I liked him because he was such an indifferent louse. He never paid any attention to any of the girls. He didn't seem to know we were there. He didn't, certainly, pay the slightest attention to me. I went home and told Ruthie about him. I said, 'I'm going to get him if it's the last thing I ever do. You wait and see. I'm going to get him yet!'

"I don't suppose I was really in love with him. By this time I'd begun to realize that I wanted to be an actress more than I wanted anything else in the world. Yet it was something, something that must have gone on through all the time and all the things that happened in between, because, after all, I did marry him! But at the time I think my main interest was figuring how much fun it would be if he should be interested in me.

"Ham was in charge of the Music and Minstrel Show at Cushing that year. One day I met him in one of the halls. He beamed down at me and said, 'Miss Davis, would you be interested in singing in my show?' I said that I would be. We practiced and rehearsed together. And I had a lot of fun, skipping octaves on him and doing all kinds of cute little tricks. I remember I sang, 'Gee, I'm Blue For You' and wore a blue dress for the occasion, which seemed to me to be just too subtle for words. I guess it was. So subtle that neither Ham nor anyone else got the big idea!

"We did several theatricals together while we were at Cushing. We did Booth Tarkington's 'Seventeen,' Ham playing Uncle Georgimus to my Lola Pratt. We sang in the Glee Club together and I would pour forth my heart and soul in the more sentimental songs. But in vain. It was humiliatingly obvious that Ham's interest was in the music, not in me. On Saturday nights, from seven to nine, we attended the regulation academy dances and I must have harried my mother for new and fetching gowns to wear. I know I sirened all over the place. But Ham seemed to be as blind to my sirening as he was to deaf to my song. And there really wasn't much chance for me to be the seductress I fancied I could be, for the dances were so well chaperoned that the walls were perfect hedges of chaperones. And the gardens were picketed, a picket for every student!

"Sundays were made bright by what was known as the co-ed hour. During that hour the girls and boys were permitted to pair off and do a little sedate strolling about the grounds. I used to pray for rain. I figured that if it rained, an umbrella would be necessary and much might be accomplished under the privacy, so to speak, of an umbrella. But maybe one of our protectors had second sight, too, or had once been young or something. At any rate, it was suspicioned that perhaps kissing might go on underneath an umbrella and the privilege of the co-ed hour was taken away, 'unless the weather is fair.'

"It was while I was at Cushing, too, that Mother called a cute little turn on me. Ruthie was helping to pay for my tuition by taking photographs of the graduating classes and deducting them from the school fees. One day the principal of Cushing called me in and asked me if I wouldn't like to help my mother by waiting on table. I was extremely indignant. I didn't say anything, but I just knew that my mother wouldn't dream of allowing me to do anything so menial as being a waitress. However, I sat down and wrote Ruthie a sweet, filial little letter, telling her how I realized all she was doing, how hard she was working and couldn't I please help her out by waiting on table, thus helping to pay my own way. You may imagine my blank astonishment when I received, by return mail, a crisp and appropriately grateful little note from Mother saying, 'Very sweet of you, dear, go ahead!'

"I did, and after my first pangs of outrage and humiliation, learned one of the most valuable lessons I've ever learned in my life. For I found out that the girls and boys were fifty per cent nicer to me, seemed fonder of me, respected and admired me more than they ever had before. I've never been afraid of work since, however humble. Wise Ruthie, she knew.

"She knew, too, I think, that I was beginning to entertain a few delusions of grandeur. Perhaps, with her second sight, she knew what was ahead for me and how much a wedge of humble pie would help my digestion! I don't know, I try," Bette laughs, "never to ask Mother anything about the future. She would tell me! Anyway, I had begun to think of myself as quite the actress. I never had any trouble with the school plays. I learned the lines easily. I loved rehearsing. I never suffered from stage fright. I felt no self-consciousness. All of my quietness and shyness and dullness and inability to talk to people seemed to drop away from me, once I got a taste of acting, even as an amateur. I've never been shy since, heaven knows!"

Ruth Davis had been wise. For it was during those two years at Cushing, that the pace of Bette's life which, so soon, was to place the little New England girl, a star, on Broadway, began to accelerate at appreciable speed. Things began to happen.

THERE WAS a summer at Camp Mudjkeewis in Maine where Bette played in the camp production of "The Courtship of Miles Standish" and received such an ovation that the very pine trees shivered under the sign of Aries. And shortly after the performance, at a game of fortune telling, Bette drew a card on which was written, "You are destined to become a great actress."

At the end of two years, Bette graduated from Cushing, and the principal said to her, "You can become a fine actress, Ruth Elizabeth. But I hope you won't."

It was during the summer vacation preceding her last year at Cushing that Bette and Bobbie and their mother spent the summer at Peterborough, New Hampshire, where Mrs. Davis had a house and a studio and Bette studied dancing under Roshanara. It was Ruth Davis' skilful manoeuvering which made that possible. For the Mariarden School of Dancing, where Roshanara was teaching, was expensive. Four hundred and fifty dollars for the two-month term. And that was beyond Ruth Davis, who had Bobbie's college tuition facing her, the expenses facing Bette when she should embark on her career, whatever it was to be. Perhaps dancing? For Roshanara had talked with Bette and wanted her for a pupil.

Ruth Davis enrolled Bette in a small, relatively unimportant school of dancing next door to the Mariarden. She then asked Roshanara if she would be good enough to come over and watch the child dance. Roshanara, already intrigued by a quality she felt but couldn't name, went over. Bette danced and the famed dancer said, "I want the Davis child." And so it was arranged.

Bette worked eight hours a day. She took the leading parts in all the pageants. She felt, for the first time, the definite knowledge that her personality was "getting over," that audiences "felt" her, were aware of her. At Cushing they had been her friends, her schoolmates; that was different. Here they were all strangers, there were many professionals. And they knew that she was there, oh, they knew! Roshanara wanted Bette to become her protege, to continue her studies with her in the fall. But before any such arrangement could be made, Roshanara died and, with her, Bette's dream of becoming a dancer.

It was at Mariarden that Frank Conroy first saw Bette. And he said to Ruth Davis, gravely, "She is something you can't buy and can't imitate. When she is on the stage you will never see anybody else, even if she never says a word."

And it was during her last year at Cushing that Bette saw Peg Entwhistle (later to die, so tragically, in Hollywood) do Hedvig in "The Wild Duck," with Blanche Yurka. "Then I really knew," Bette tells you. "Then everything focused to one pin-point of burning ambition. I remember saying to Mother, 'If I can live to play that part I shall die happy.' And Mother answered, with a flash of that second sight of hers, I suppose, 'You will.'

"The year after I graduated from Cushing we spent in Newton, Massachusetts. Mother took a house there, had her work. She said to Bobbie and me, 'We'll take this year to do some catching up, financially. In the fall you will be going to college, Bobbie. In the meantime it won't do you girls any harm to have a year at home being capable housekeepers. You can cook and clean and darn and mend and do the things every woman should know how to do.'

"We did. I've always had the suspicion that Mother insisted upon that year of domesticity with the idea of testing me, trying me out, waiting to see whether my desire to go on the stage was real, or would dwindle away. It didn't dwindle. I wasn't happy. I was champing at the bit. I saw Ham occasionally. I still threatened to 'get him'! But I was too obsessed by my desire to get to New York, to get on the stage, to have much time or emotion for anything else."

THE YEAR passed. Bobbie was safely enrolled at Dennison College, in Granville, Ohio. Bette and her mother closed the Newton house, packed bags, entrained for New York. Bette's heart was set on studying under Eva Le Gallienne, being admitted to her stock company. "My whole heart was set on it," Bette will tell you now. "It seemed to me that the very blood in my veins coursed in that direction, that my feet pointed that way, that I pointed Le Gallienne-wards, like a setter."

Dr. Favour was discouraging. The family frowned upon the fantastic pilgrimage. No good, they said, would come of it.

In New York, Bette and her mother took a room. A very modest room. What did the room matter? They were on the brink of the great adventure. They were launching a career. "When you are living," says Bette, "what does it matter where you live?"

Bette set forth, alone, for her interview with Eva Le Gallienne. Every day, every week, every month, every year of her life had, she knew, been but steps to this climax.

Bette says, "I had my interview. Eva Le Gallienne sat there. She asked me to read the part of an old Dutch woman. I did. She told me (how could she have known?) that I did not take the theatre seriously. She told me, in effect, to go to hell. It was as brutal as it was unexpected.

"That was the first and almost the last time, until we came to Hollywood, that we ever hit rock bottom. Under Eva Le Gallienne's coldly critical eye I seemed to see myself as—as the family saw me. That little Davis girl, without beauty, without personality, without promise. So cold and complete was this expulsion from my hope, my dream, my very life that even Mother faltered. We decided to give it all up as it had, so effortlessly, so curtly, given me up before ever I began.

"Ruthie took a house in Norwalk, Connecticut, got a job in a photographic studio again and I went mad. I walked the streets. I talked to myself. I really was out of my mind. I had to be an actress. I wasn't an actress. I had to be an actress. I wasn't an actress, like a crazy pendulum, my mind swung from nauseating discouragement to furious rebellion. I would end it all, I would show the world, show Eva Le Gallienne, Ruthie, the whole family. I would stun, startle, astound; give performances that would ring through the very hierarchies of histrionics and become history: I would do nothing, be nothing, succumb, surrender. So it went. So I went almost crazy.

"There was a Yale boy. I'd go for long rides with him, grim, silent. He wanted me to marry him, to give up my crazy idea about being an actress. He said, I believe, that I'd have to give it up or not marry him. I laughed like a maniac.

"Four months of this, or was it five, or ten, or forever and a day? I don't know. Then, one morning, I woke to find Mother standing over me, shaking me, all but pinching and scratching me. 'Get up!' she commanded loudly, 'get up! We're going to New York. You're going on the stage.' I thought, for an instant, that insanity was infectious and that she had gone off the deep end, too.

She got my best dress. I put it on. She told me how to fix my hair. I fixed it. Then, looking, Ruthie often says, like Lillian Gish in one of her most wistful, wild moments, we entrained for New York, bag and baggage. This time, I think I knew there would be no turning back. There wasn't.

MOTHER STEERED me straight to the John Murray Anderson School of Dramatics. She managed to barge right into the presence of Mr. Anderson himself. She said, 'My daughter wants to be an actress. You've got to make her one. I can't afford to pay your tuition fee all at once. I'll have to do it on the installment plan, a little at a time.'

"Mr. Anderson asked to see me. His instinct of self-preservation doubtless dictated that request. Ruthie, I feel sure, looked quite wild. As she looked when she saw me getting off the train after I was burned. She's often said that my face, during those months in Norwalk, was more terrible than it was after the accident. Mother walked into the outer office where I sat waiting, nipped me by the sleeve and, quite literally speaking, commended me to Mr. Anderson's professional care. He took a look at me (looking my best at the time. Mother had seen to that) and said, "I'll take her."

"Mother got a position at St. Mary's School. There were three scholarships given at the John Murray Anderson School. I managed to win one of them.

"Also, for the first time, I was on my own. I entered the school late, you see. There was only one girl who hadn't paired off with some other girl by the time I arrived. A girl named Virginia C——. We took a room together in an old brownstone front house. And I had my first taste of eating in cafeterias, doing my own wash, drying my handkerchiefs on the window panes, doing a little light cooking over the gas-jets. Good for me, all very good for me. Virginia was good for me, too. She was the first girl I'd ever known who used lipstick and much too much of it. She was the first girl I'd ever known who had had to fight life with her own hands and wits and did. She was uneducated academically speaking. But she was a Phi Beta Kappa in most of the subjects worth knowing. She was all wool and several yards wide. I not only became very fond of her, I also felt a wholesome respect for her.

"We had a lot of fun those months. When Ruthie came to stay with us we had a time rigging up a bed for her. She wouldn't share our bed with us or let us take pot-luck, because we were both working hard and, she insisted, needed our sleep. So she'd tote herself up on two chairs with a suitcase wedged between them to make a 'bed.' Every now and again during the night there would be strange earthquakish sounds and they would be caused by Ruthie falling into the suitcase, onto the floor, or following one of the chairs around the room when it parted company with the other chair. Then we'd wake up and laugh like three fools."

Bette didn't graduate from the John Murray Anderson School. She didn't want to. She had got some confidence. She had got over the chill dealt her by Eva Le Gallienne. She wanted to get going. She felt that she needed practical experience. And coincidentally with this decision came a chance to go to Rochester, to play a bit in "Broadway" with George Cukor's stock company there.

At the train as Bette was leaving, Ruth Davis said to her, "I want you to learn the two major girls' parts in this play, Bette." Bette said, "What for? I'm not going to play 'em." Ruth Davis smiled. "Oh, yes, you are," she said, "for on the opening night the girl who plays the lead is going to break her leg." The train started and with the shriek of the engine was mingled Bette's shriek, "Whyyy, Mooother!"

Bette learned the parts. To this day she can't explain why she learned them, why she obeyed her mother who was just being amusing, of course. Still, she remembered Pemaquid. On the opening night the girl who played one of the two leads tripped on the narrow circular staircase coming down from the dressing rooms and—broke her leg!

Bette said, "I thought, 'Ohmigod, Mother has done this to this girl!'"

But Bette played the part. And it was on the strength of her having saved "Broadway" for George Cukor that she became, shortly thereafter, a regular member of his stock company in Rochester.

BEFORE LEAVING for Rochester, Bette had chance to do a play, "The Earth Between," with the Provincetown Players, that cradle of so much dramatic talent. James Light, who was directing, had seen her work in "Broadway," and been sufficiently impressed to offer her the part. But Bette turned it down, then. She felt that she needed a great deal more working experience before she "came into New York," as it were.

And so, Bette and her mother set up housekeeping in

The winnah! Bette captured the Academy Award for her performance in "Dangerous." Vic MacLaglen was another Academy winner.

One false move will fix Bette and Leslie Howard. At least that's how Humphrey Bogart feels in "Petrified Forest."

"You see, it was like this . . ." or words to that effect. Wayne Morris and Bette in "Kid Galahad," above.

And here we have Bette Davis just being herself. When she first hit Hollywood they called her a "little brown wren." Not much resemblance here, d'you think?

Rochester, about which there are amusing anecdotes. Ruth Davis will tell you, "Bette was earning fifty dollars a week. I decided to give up my job to be with her. We took an apartment in Rochester and after we had been there a day or two, Bette hated it. She has always been abnormally sensitive to her surroundings. And she would wake up there and have the blue jitters. She said she couldn't stand it, it was murky. We had a lease. Well, we'd have to get out of that lease. But how?

"I finally devised a scheme. I took a shoe, a man's shoe, and made tracks in the soft mud all around our windows. Then I went to the landlady, told her my daughter was extremely nervous, that a man had tried to break into our apartment the night before and that if we were forced to remain there my daughter would not be able to work, the rent would not be paid, and what to do? Then I went back home. A little later, as I had expected, the landlady came sniffing around. She knew the ground was muddy, that, if I had been telling the truth, which she more than suspicioned I had not, there would be the marks of a man's feet. There were. And we were released."

It was in Rochester that Bette fell in love. And one of the most poignant dramas in her dramatic life began. For it was the old, old fictional angle of the young business man of good family falling in love with the actress. The old story of prejudice and parental opposition and cross purposes and broken young hearts and tears. They were very much in love, Bette and the young business man. They became engaged. They planned to be married. Bette met the family. They admired her, admitted her charm, her gentle birth but deplored and rejected her profession. Especially the father, who held the mid-Victorian axiom that, married to an actress, his son were better dead. It was as bad as that, and in the twentieth century.

And so, when you say to Bette, "And what happened?" she answers, "He threw me over. Shortly after George Cukor fired me, for he did, I had a letter from him. Rather a cruel letter. He told me simply that it was all over. It sort of broke my heart. I didn't understand how love could be 'all over' when it wasn't. I remember so well the day that letter came. A scorching hot day. I was in Newark, New Jersey, rehearsing for 'The Wild Duck.' I was about to play Hedvig and I had said that if I could live to play that part I would die happy. How young and green I seemed to myself remembering, the letter in my hand, that now I could never be happy until I died. I thought, 'This has killed me.' I even put my mutilated little rag of pride into my pocket and wrote to him and told him that I understood (I didn't), that I would wait. He never answered. I never heard from him again, not for several years."

Bette knew heartbreak then. For five months, Ruth Davis tells me, she went about like a wounded little animal. Then came the day when she cried out, "I'll make him sorry!" And Ruth Davis knew that convalescence had set in.

ONLY A few years ago, in Hollywood, Bette had a letter from that boy she had loved. He had never married. He wrote that he was flying West to see her. Bette and her mother entertained him. Bette swam with him, danced with him, dined with him, laughed with him, at him, at herself, at that old pain he had caused her, at her recovery from pain. And then he went away again and Bette's hurt was vindicated. Not that she cared any more, not even for vindication. She remembered that she had loved him and did not find it hard to believe. But the wound was healed. And Ham had come into her life and her heart again; love that was honest and humble and strong and sure.

Bette never quite knew, doesn't know now, just why George Cukor fired her from the Rochester Stock Company. Ruth Davis suspects that she may have been a little bit to blame. Because she would never allow Bette to go out with the company after the evening performances, nor any other time. Bette left the theatre with her mother, went home with her mother. She was not, perhaps, the kind of a person who put her fellow players at their ease. Whatever the reason, she was fired. And felt, again, that it was all over. Her first real job, and fired. But Ruth Davis had learned a lesson from those four months in Norwalk. Never again would she allow Bette to suffer as she had suffered then. Action was the only remedy. She said, "You telegraph James Light at the Provincetown Players. Tell him you will play the part in 'The Earth Between.' No, of course he hasn't cast it yet. I know that he hasn't. He wanted you then. He will want you now."

Bette played in "The Earth Between." She didn't, she says now, have the least idea what the play, which dealt with certain perversities of human nature, nor her part were all about. Which is why, no doubt, she gave to the character the young bewilderment, the sense of moving in a mist. The play went to New York and all that night, that opening night, Ruth Davis sat up, unable to sleep, afraid, when morning came, to see the papers. Friends brought the papers in, read the reviews aloud, sang them. The most eminent and caustic of the critics told the world, not only that "that little Davis girl" had promise, but that she had kept her promise.

Ruth Davis said to the new young star, "If you let this go to your head, you're through." And Bette answered, "I can't let it go to my head, I think I'm terrible." Bette has never, she will tell you, believed in her own success. It is, still, the will o' the wisp which evades her.

She had a chance to understudy one of the Gishes. Again Ruth Davis advised her. "Never be an understudy, or you will never have an understudy."

There came, one day, a call on the telephone. Bette was never to be sure just what the voice said. She managed to pick up "Cecil Clavelli—Ibsen Repertory . . . Hedvig . . . "The Wild Duck" . . . you . . ."

So, she was to play in "The Wild Duck." She got her heart broken. She came down with the measles. She remembers, "One of the most ebb-tide moments of my life was when, with my heart in tatters, the part I wanted to play more than anything in the world put right in my lap, I had to call and say, 'I can't do it. I—I've got the measles!' "

The company waited for Bette. She learned three Ibsen plays while in bed waiting for the more noticeable of the spots to disappear. Then, still ill and feverish and "miserably measley" she went on and played Hedvig. She says now, "I'll never know how I got through that first night. A more wretched, sick at heart, sick of body creature never walked the boards. I thought, as I went in, 'I don't know the lines. I don't remember one of them. I don't know what I am supposed to say, or do, or be. Somehow, I got through. Fools and children, I suppose . . . and afterwards I went on tour with 'Wild Duck.'

THE FOLLOWING summer, deciding that I needed more experience in stock, and having met a plausible young man in New York, who told me that he was the manager of the Cape Players and that I would be a too, too welcome addition to the company, Ruthie and I bought an antiquated Ford, piled into it every stick and ribbon we possessed and chugged up to the Cape. We arrived, having rented a cottage, by mail, in advance.

"We found that one Mr. Raymond Moore was the real manager. I said to him, 'I am Bette Davis.' He looked politely blank, more blank than polite. I said, 'Your Mr.— told me I would be engaged.' He said, 'Mr. —— has no authority.' I said, 'But here I am. What can I do?' He said, 'You can usher.' And I did.

"All summer long I was head usher at the theatre where the Cape Players gave their plays. And a very efficient usher, if I do say so. Then, just at the end of the season, Laura Hope Crews, who was coaching and producing the Cape Players, needed someone to warble, 'I Pass By Your Window,' in 'Mr. Pim.' I rendered the number. And the question was, was I an usher who had become an actress or an actress who had become an usher?

"The question was never resolved to anyone's satisfaction, but I didn't care. I didn't care much about anything that summer because I had found Ham again! He was playing in the Amherst Band, across the Cape, in the Old Mill Tavern.

"I remember well the first night I saw him. Ruthie and I had gone to the movies. I even remember the picture we were seeing. Norma Shearer in 'A Free Soul.' I happened to look around and there was Ham! I let out a blood-curdling yell and got a good kick from Mother.

"All that summer, whenever I wasn't ushering and Ham wasn't playing with the band, we went around together. We tore around the Cape in the old Ford. We went swimming. We lay long hours on the beach and talked and talked and talked and grew to know, I think, even though no words were said, that this was somehow very right, that we belonged together.

"In the fall we went back to New York, Ham went back to Amherst. Now and then, during the year, I'd go up to Amherst to see him. He never saw me on the stage. Never. He had a feeling about it. He said, 'I'd always think I was annoying you.' "

In the fall of the year after "The Wild Duck" closed, Bette tramped the streets, made the rounds of casting offices, had what was really her first and was to be her last taste of the experience of job-hunting. She and a girl friend took a room on Fifty-third Street, another of the old brownstone fronts, and the interlude of laundry-done-in-the-basin, gas-jet meals, Ruthie sleeping on two chairs with a suitcase wedged between.

And then, again the pace accelerated. Bette played the part of Elaine Bumpstead in Marion Gering's production of "Broken Dishes." Twice, Producer Gering had postponed rehearsals because he could not find the right Elaine. Instantly Bette entered his line of vision he hailed Elaine. And the critics hailed her, too.

During this winter Bette went out on dates for the first time in her life. She remembers the first big date. She says, "A girl I knew asked me if I would go on a double date with her. She said, 'Could you manage a man of forty, do you think, dear? You'll have to drink, my dear.' I said I thought I could manage. We went to the Ritz-Carlton for dinner. I was so excited. It was the first time I had ever been to the Ritz. Cocktails were served. I played with my glass, hoping to escape detection. Later, we went on to a night-club, my first night-club. And I was twenty-one! And when we started home, the 'man of forty' said to me, 'It's so wonderful to meet a girl smart enough not to drink!' I couldn't resist a triumphant and distinctly malicious wink in the direction of my friend."

IT WAS while Bette was playing in "The Solid South," starring Richard Bennett, that Sam Goldwyn asked her, through Arthur Hornblow, to take her first movie test. Bette had never even thought of the movies for herself. The test was for "Raffles." And it was, she says, horrible. It was a silent test but it spoke, Bette recalls, with the tongues of scorpions. From the test she found out, among other things, that her teeth had to be straightened. Nothing came of the test but a bill from the orthodontist. And she did the last weeks of "Solid South" "with my mouth bristling with bands."

The second movie test was for Universal. It was a cold, cold day. She had to go to the extreme edge of New York. Her nerves were on edge. And as the lights went on and the director called "Action!" she gave him action he had never expected. She went out, cold. When she came to, she said, "Don't mind, I do this quite often."

"I was 'invited' to go to Hollywood, to Universal on a three months' contract. I tried to get a new play before leaving for the Coast, hoping that I might be able to stall the inevitable. I didn't want to go to Hollywood. But I didn't get the play and we did go to the Coast.

"We landed in Hollywood December 13th, 1930. The meeting out here, I must tell you! No one met us. We didn't know a soul, didn't know where to go, what to do. I might not have minded so much if I had never done anything in New York. I had been, indeed, rather spoiled and pampered. And here we were, finally checked in at the Hollywood-Plaza Hotel. I called the studio and said, 'My name is Bette Davis. I am here. I just came in on the train. What am I to do now?' There was an ominous pause on the wire before a voice, very pallid, said, 'Oh, we were at the station when your train came in, we didn't see anyone who looked like an actress!'

"That stopped me. In the next few days I took a good look-see about Hollywood. I should like to have died. Those were the days when the movie girls were all too damned flamboyant. Chromium blondes, clothes consisting mainly of feathers, white fox, sequins and a very little of those. And here was I, guiltless of so much as a lipstick. I had never used a lipstick in my life, except on the stage. I had never been to a hairdresser's. My eyebrows were as God had made them. I wore my hair long, a nice neat bun at the nape of my neck. I smiled, a crooked little smile because I was still remembering the brace recently removed from my teeth. There wasn't an artificial thing about me. I looked like Alice wondering about Wonderland!

"I must say this for Hollywood, whatever it may do for people mentally, it does force women to make the most of themselves, physically. You have only to look at the pictures of any of us then and now to know how true this is.

"But then, the terrible then! I hadn't been here very long before it was borne in upon me that they weren't going to do anything very great with me. Everything they did do made me squirm. They bobbed my hair, which broke me up, my 'crowning glory' and all that. They took stills of me that were horrible. They gave me my first part, the 'good sister,' in 'The Bad Sister,' with Sidney Fox.

"I did a picture for Columbia, on loan, called 'The Menace.' People fell out of closets and things. I don't know what I did, not that it mattered. I felt a ray of hope when I did 'Way Back Home' with the Philips Lord gang. I did 'Seed' and 'Waterloo Bridge.' The hope didn't last long. I was petrified of the camera. I always played somebody's sister. And at the end of the year Universal told me I could go. Where, they didn't say, nor, I can guarantee, care.

MY LITTLE screening spirit was all but broken. I knew that they had called me 'the little brown wren' and that lamed my little ego which had been so pleasantly propped up on Broadway. But I was really crucified when I was told that one of the top producers at Universal had said of me, 'I know she's a good actress, but you've got to be careful about casting her, same as you have to be careful about Slim Summerville!' I died forty dusty deaths when I heard that. Nor was I exactly resurrected when my informant went on to quote the producer as saying, 'She has no sex appeal. No one will believe that a fellow would walk to the corner to get her!' "

Bette and Ruth Davis had just about dragged out the suitcases when there came a surprise call from Warner Brothers studio. The message was, "Mr. Arliss wants to see Miss Davis."

Mr. Arliss wanted to see Bette for the part opposite him in "The Man Who Played God." He wanted someone with dignity, someone who would make it believable that he would fall in love with her. Bette, with exciting memories of the great Mr. Arliss on Broadway, Mr. Arliss in "The Devil," Mr. Arliss in "The Green Goddess," felt that a miracle had befallen her. And she remembers, "He scared me to death. His first words were, 'You look very young, my dear. How much experience?' I said, 'Three years,' and he smiled and answered, 'Enough to rub the edges off.'

"I got the part and went into screaming hysterics. But I must have managed the required dignity. For at the end of the picture I signed my Warner Brothers contract, a facsimile of the contract I had had with Universal, one of the old, original Hollywood contracts, the very same contract I have today!

"So, then I was a movie actress. Ruthie and I took a small rented house. Bobbie, college over, joined us out here. I began my endless chain. 'The Rich Are Always With Us,' with Ruth Chatterton and George Brent, 'So Big,' 'The Cabin in the Cotton,' with Richard Barthelmess, which was a step forward, 'Three on a Match,' '20,000 Years in Sing Sing' with Spencer Tracy, and what an actor he is! Nobody on God's green earth has any idea how great he is, so great that no one knows he is acting! I told Ham," Bette laughs, "that it's just as well we were married just before I did '20,000 Years,' because after I met Spencer it might have been just too bad!

"It was in 1932, during my first year at Warners, that Ham came out. And we knew that we wanted to be married. But I felt, then, that the very worst thing Ham could do would be to stay out here. I felt that it would handicap him, wouldn't be fair to him. We didn't have much time to talk it over, however, because one minute after he arrived, Warner Brothers sent me East on a personal appearance tour. Ham waited for me. And for want of anything better to do he picked up his trumpet and played in the Olympic Band at the Olympic Games. I've always regretted that I didn't see him in his sash and Here's something pretty nice which we wouldn't mind having around the house! Hollywood brings out the best in a girl's looks, according to Bette and judging from this, she's right!

Together again. Bette and Leslie Howard seem to be pretty engrossed in each other in "It's Love I'm After," Miss D.'s current picture.

turban! He must have cut a dashing figure!

"I was away for two months and when I came back on the first of August, well, we were married on the eighteenth. I knew then what I had always known, I think. That Ham and I belonged together. I had just been afraid for Ham, afraid of what Hollywood might do to his career, afraid of putting him in the position of being a star's husband. I've said before that women with careers should be shot, that the instant a girl-child shows any talent for anything other than minding the baby or making fudge she should be shot on sight. And I still say it. The things that women with careers do to their men is murder. Now, Ham is all right. He is with Rockwell O'Keefe, agents. He is on his way, his own way. And he is so generous of spirit, so considerate, so completely without mean rancors or jealousies that we are all right. We've no worries now.

BUT THE wedding! That story must be told! When Ham first came out, in 1932, it all started as a rib, one of those wholly in earnest and partly in fun ribs. He'd say to me, over a soda fountain at Hollywood and Vine or wherever we happened to be, 'I think we ought to be married while I'm here,' and I'd say, 'Oh, I think that would be sort of silly!'

"We had a cottage at Zuma Beach that summer, Ruthie and Bobbie and I. Ham stayed with us and the day would be punctuated with our dotty dialogue. Ham: 'I think we should be married.' Bette: 'If you get a job here I'll think about it.' One bright morning Ham said, 'I think we'll get married today.' And I said, 'Don't be ridiculous.'

Mother took me upstairs that morning and told me I'd better stop my nonsense, that if I didn't marry Ham the chances were that he'd go away, feel too discouraged and not come back again. And then I'd be sorry. I knew how sorry. I knew how right she was. Characteristically, I didn't admit it, then.

"That night Ham drove us back to the Hollywood house. He said, 'You're going to marry me tonight.' I said, 'I am not!' He'd repeat, 'tonight' and I'd say, 'Weelll . . .' My young cousin, who was staying with us, told me that when I'd say, 'Weelll,' he'd get up and dress and when I said, 'I am not,' he'd undress and go back to bed again and that he kept that up for hours.

"Finally, close to midnight I said, 'Well' for the last time. And, with the endurance of all concerned at the breaking point, we set out for Yuma, Arizona, two carloads of us. Mother, my aunt and cousin, Bobbie, two dogs, Ham and I. Quite a nice little group!

"Came dawn and we were still a hundred miles from Yuma, which was hundreds of miles more than we had thought. The thermometer registered 107 in the shade! Ham and I hadn't spoken one word the whole way. It was on the tip of my tongue to say, 'This is horrible, I won't go on.' Ruthie stopped me. She sensed the furies boiling and said, 'Let's not go on.' Which was, of course, the one divinely inspired thing to say. For the mule in me immediately gave a back-kick of the heels and told Ham to step on the gas.

"We arrived in Yuma. Everyone was soaked to the skin. We managed to get three hotel rooms. We all took baths and sat around draped in the counterpanes while our wet rags dried. Ham had to go out and get a new shirt and a wedding ring. I kept muttering, 'This is so awful it's funny!'

"When I was asked whether this was my first marriage, I said, 'My third.' That got back to the studio!

"We were married in the house of a Methodist minister. The two poodles washed themselves all through the ceremony. I wore a beige two-piece street dress which resembled the sands of the Arizona desert after the rain it never gets, brown accessories, and two limp gardenias. I kept thinking of the picture I'd always had of myself as a bride, dewy and divine in white satin and orange blossoms, coming up a white ribboned aisle to the strains of Mendelssohn, looking too divine.

"We then drove back to Hollywood. The next day I had to be at the Santa Barbara fiesta, a promise to the studio. We spent a hot, exhausted day fiesta-ing while I kept up a running monologue to myself of 'This isn't the way a wedding should be, this is revolting, this is perfectly horrible.'

"In October I had an appendectomy. We stayed at the beach for a time and Ham would drive me to the studio every morning, starting at five A. M. And would sit in my dressing room all day long, waiting to drive me home again. And I had plenty of qualms and fears that my first fears for him would come true. Now, it's all right. It's all adjusted, beautifully."

Bette went on with her "endless chain." She made "Bureau of Missing Persons," "Fashion Follies of 1934," "Fog Over Frisco," "Housewife." In 1934 she was loaned to RKO-Radio and made "Of Human Bondage" with Leslie Howard. "That picture," Bette says, "was the first honest-to-God rung." She had high hopes of what that picture would mean to her, the difference it would make. The hopes faltered. The difference didn't come true. She made "Bordertown" and "The Girl from 10th Avenue," "Front Page Woman," "Special Agent." She made "Dangerous" and won the Academy Award, but the Award was, actually, for "Bondage." It was righting a wrong which, because of politics and deferred judgments, was done her when the Award did not go to her for "Bondage." She made "Petrified Forest" and "Satan Met a Lady" and "Golden Arrow" and others. And she was tired and tense and discouraged.

She works a good racquet, does Bette, but only on the tennis court. Here she is, all set for a fast game on the court at her Hollywood home.

And then she went away. She went abroad, for the first time in her life. She travelled. And, in England, she brought suit against Warner Brothers, seeking freedom from what she felt to be the bondage of her old, original Hollywood contract.

Bette lost the case, a case so headlined as to be familiar to everyone. But she is not sorry that she did what she did. She said, "I was in such a state of mind that I couldn't be a good sport about it any longer."

Bette did not make money an issue. The issues were the parts she played. She wanted the right to be loaned out once a year when, and as, particularly fine parts were offered her. She wanted time between pictures, a chance to rest, to travel, to refresh and refuel her used-up emotions and energies.

She lost. But she had, perhaps, the satisfaction which comes from striking out, even though the blows hit blank, unyielding walls. It was so much out of her pent-up system. It was relief from tension. And she felt better that she'd done it.

She came back and made "Marked Woman," "Kid Galahad," "That Certain Woman," "It's Love I'm After." She enjoyed the last two especially. She was pleased to be playing again with Leslie Howard. She was pleased that the studio got Henry Fonda to play opposite her in "That Certain Woman," a concession and a generous gesture since they don't customarily, borrow players. She was pleased because the two pictures offered a balanced diversity of characterization.

She is now, at least, content. She has made up her disciplined mind to be content. The Powers That Be have been, she says, completely charming to her since she came back. The victors are generous in their victory as the loser is gallant in defeat.

Bette, who, from the days of her childhood, has always been able to accept finality, accepts finality now.

Now this New Cream with "Skin-Vitamin"

Helps Women's Skin More Directly

"It keeps skin faults away more surely"
—ELEANOR K. ROOSEVELT

A NEW KIND OF CREAM is bringing more direct help to women's skin!

It is bringing to their aid the vitamin which especially helps to build new skin tissue, the vitamin which helps to keep skin healthy—the "skin-vitamin."

When there is not enough of this "skin-vitamin" in the diet, the skin may suffer—become undernourished, rough and subject to infections.

For over three years Pond's tested this "skin-vitamin" in Pond's Creams. In animal tests, skin became rough and dry when the diet lacked "skin-vitamin." Treatment with Pond's new "skin-vitamin" cream made it smooth and healthy again—in only 3 weeks!

When women used the creams, three out of every four of them came back asking for more. In four weeks they reported pores looking finer, skin smoother, richer looking!

Same jars, same labels, same price

Now everyone can enjoy these benefits. The new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream is in the same jars, with the same labels, at the same price. Use it your usual way for daytime and nightly cleansing, for freshening-ups before powder.

Every jar of Pond's Cold Cream now contains this precious "skin-vitamin." Not the "sunshine" vitamin. Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not "irradiated." But the vitamin which especially helps to rebuild skin tissue. Whenever you have a chance, leave a little of the cream on. In a few weeks, see how much better your skin is.

Cocosticks built into a little house are an interesting Thanksgiving table decoration. They're simple to make and delicious to eat.

THERE IS no doubt that, from a culinary point of view, the most interesting day of the entire year is Thanksgiving—when foods come to the fore to receive a greater degree of interest than is accorded them at any other time.

So I was naturally delighted when Spring Byington—that attractive screen player, who so charmingly enacts the mother in pictures about The Jones Family—discussed her Thanksgiving plans with me and gave me some of her favorite recipes.

First, we went into the subject of table decorations for this occasion. And I found that, in Miss Byington's opinion, no table decorations could possibly be more attractive than the foods themselves, particularly the turkey surrounded by other delicacies in colorful array!

In describing the dishes she suggested, we'll omit the first course and start right off with the main event. "Let's talk turkey immediately," was the way she put it.

Both of us favored a light, dry bread stuffing rather than a solid, moist one. In outlining the rest of her menu, Miss Byington suggested many unusual ideas, several of which are given here in recipe form. Not too unusual, mind you, for there are certain traditional features which none would wish to omit. But a new dish is always good.

The bird and the stuffing we have already mentioned, and a giblet gravy accompaniment can also be taken for granted by us all. Cranberries are also sure to be included on every menu. This year why not try Cranberry Sherbet, for a welcome change? Its novelty will carry the day and it will make a particular hit with the younger fry who like ices of all sorts.

FEW youngsters should go in for rich pies and puddings. So why not make them up a batch of Cocosticks, which you see illustrated here? You'll find the recipe easy to follow and the results will delight old and young alike.

Maple Marshmallow Sweet Potatoes came up next for discussion. But, why discuss them? Nothing I can tell you could do full justice to this dressy dish, so I'll just give you the recipe.

Many people like squash served as a vegetable on Thanksgiving. Others who use squash for their pie, prefer to omit it as a main course feature. Here is a healthful and simple recipe, and also recipes for several other members of the supporting cast of tempting foods that appear on the same feature program with this popular poultry star. Read them carefully and if you try them out we'll be willing to wager you won't be disappointed.

BAKED SQUASH

Scrub a three- to four-pound winter squash. Place whole on a rack and bake in moderate oven until it is soft and can be easily pricked with a fork. Cut in half, peel and remove seeds and strings. Mash the pulp and for each cup of squash add 1 tablespoon butter, 1 teaspoon brown sugar, ¼ teaspoon salt and a light dash of ginger. Moisten with cream to the desired consistency, beating until light. Place in hot serving dish and sprinkle generously with seedless raisins and a few chopped nuts.

CRANBERRY SHERBET

3 cups cranberries
2 cups boiling water
2 cups sugar
1 tablespoon lemon juice
¼ teaspoon salt
2 teaspoons gelatin
½ cup cold water

Pick over and wash cranberries. Drain, add boiling water and cook until berries are soft. Force through a sieve or food mill. Add sugar, lemon juice and salt. Bring to a boil, remove from heat and add gelatin which has soaked for 5 minutes in the cold water. Stir until gelatin has dissolved. Turn into freezing tray of automatic refrigerator and freeze quickly. Or pack in ice and salt in ice cream freezer for several hours. Stirring is not necessary.

FORE!

COCOSTICKS

⅔ cup sweetened condensed milk
1 tablespoon cocoa
7 slices day old bread
½ cup finely shredded cocoanut

Thoroughly blend sweetened condensed milk and cocoa. Remove crusts from 1-inch thick slices of bread and cut each slice crosswise into 1-inch strips. Cover bread sticks on all sides with cocoanut mixture, then roll in cocoanut. Place on greased cookie sheet and brown lightly.

These sticks taste like cocoanut-frosted chocolate angel cake. As a Thanksgiving table decoration, they can be built into a little house, as shown in the illustration.

MAPLE MARSHMALLOW SWEET POTATOES

2 cups mashed sweet potatoes
2 tablespoons evaporated milk
¼ cup melted butter
⅓ cup maple flavored syrup
10 marshmallows

Mash cooked, peeled sweet potatoes until free of all lumps. Putting them through a ricer makes it easier. Add evaporated milk, butter, syrup and salt. Beat together thoroughly. Pile lightly into buttered casserole. Cut marshmallows in halves and place on top of potatoes, cut side down. Cook in moderate oven (375°F.) until marshmallows are brown.

TURKEY STUFFING

(10 pound turkey)
1½ small loaves day old bread
1½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 teaspoon poultry seasoning
2 small white onions, minced fine
1 cup butter
¼ cup water
1 tablespoon minced parsley

Pick bread, crusts and all, into small pieces. Add salt, pepper, poultry seasoning and minced onions. Melt butter in large frying pan. Add bread mixture and cook gently until thoroughly blended and a very light golden brown. Add water gradually, blending well. Remove from heat, add minced parsley.

Germs just scram when I get my Mennen Oil Rub!

"Boy, do I feel grand and SAFE after my daily body-rub with Mennen Antiseptic Oil. You bet I do! 'Cause germs just hate it. When I was born my doctor said, 'I want this future president kept safe . . . so rub him daily with Mennen Antiseptic Oil.' That's just what they've done. And you ought to see my skin; I don't know when I've had a rash or sore spot on it. What's that? You want to keep your baby's skin safe from germs, too? Then take a tip from me—rub him every day with Mennen Antiseptic Oil!"

Nine-tenths of all the hospitals important in maternity work use Mennen Antiseptic Oil on their babies every day. Your baby deserves it, too!

MENNEN Antiseptic OIL

Most hospitals rub their babies with it daily

Wayne Morris (First printing. Number of requests 370.) Here is a boy who has gotten the breaks, and he's made the most of them. Born right in the heart of Los Angeles, he attended school and junior college in California, then joined the Pasadena Community Playhouse School. He appeared in numerous plays, the most successful of which was "Yellowjack." In this a Warner Brothers talent scout saw him and he was given a contract with that studio. His present ambition is to become a successful screen star, and if that doesn't work out then he'd just as soon be a salesman. At the present writing he is gaining in popularity by the day, but as yet he has no business manager and no secretary. He is six feet two inches tall, weighs a hundred and ninety pounds, has blue eyes and blond hair and is an all-around he-man. His first really big movie role was the prize-fighter in "Kid Galahad." He owns a pet police dog, hopes some day to have a stable of horses and a beach house, and his hobby is keeping a scrapbook.

Jeanette MacDonald (Last printed May, 1937. Total number of requests since then 653.) It's hard to believe that the breathtakingly beautiful Jeanette of today was ever scrawny and freckled, with teeth too wide apart and legs like pipestems. But it's true. In addition to these very definite handicaps, however, the young MacDonald girl possessed a will of iron, indomitable courage and an heroic ambition to succeed. At the tender age of three she stood all alone in a large Presbyterian church in Philadelphia and sang the difficult hymn, "There Will Be Glory for Me." As she grew older, girls made fun of her and mocked her for this defect or that one. Jeanette took it on the chin. And she fought back. She exercised with spartan endurance. Followed a rigid diet and before anyone realized it there developed from the fourteen-year-old ugly duckling of 1914 the beautiful, golden Jeanette of today. While still little more than a child, she danced with Ann Pennington and others in Philadelphia theatres and then entered the lists of Ned Wayburn's chorus girls. It was her vivacious interpretation of the title role of "Yes, Yes, Yvette" that won her her first important recognition. After that, her career shot upwards like a rocket, carrying her to the very pinnacle of success in Hollywood. Her most outstanding pictures have been made with Nelson Eddy, but Mr. Eddy did not win her heart in real life. It was Gene Raymond who, this past June, marched Jeanette down the aisle in one of Hollywood's most spectacular wedding ceremonies. Her current picture is "The Firefly," with Allan Jones.

If you'd like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, and, incidentally, help boost his or her standing in our barometer, fill in and send us the coupon on this page, or, if that seems too much trouble, just write. Your request will be recorded whether you bother with the coupon or not, as that is the only gauge we have in rating the stars each month. Try to save yourself two cents by using postcards whenever possible.

Robert Kent (Last printed January, 1937. Total number of requests since then 377.) One of Hollywood's rising young men, of whom big things are expected during the coming year, Robert Kent has been an able seaman, a prizefighter, a farm hand, a bank messenger, a riding master and a professional model during the course of his career. His father died when he was six years old, leaving his mother the sole responsibility of fitting her son for the years to come. She managed to make enough money to send him through a Brooklyn high school. After that he was on his own and moved from job to job, not as a drifter, but as a seeker. It was his modelling job, acquired because of his six-foot-out-of-door physique, that really began his theatrical career. He became acquainted with a group of players who called themselves the Brooklyn Neighborhood Theatre and they gave Kent a role in "King Lear." Right then and there he knew where his future lay and he went after it hammer and tongs. From one small stage role to another, he finally landed himself a contract with Paramount. He found, however, that a contract didn't necessarily mean you worked in pictures, so he tore it up and went back to the stage to appear in "Kind Lady," with May Robson. Darryl Zanuck saw him in this one and he was signed by 20th Century-Fox, where he has made a number of successful pictures and where he still hangs his hat. Rest assured you'll be seeing a lot of Mr. K. during the coming picture season.

Put your favorite movie star at the top of the barometer—send your requests today!

Josephine Mazur, New Kensington, Pa. You lose. Jack Haley did not sing in "Wake Up and Live." The vocalizing was done by Buddy Clark. Alice Faye's latest picture is "In Old Chicago," with Tyrone Power and Don Ameche.

N. Gaddis Heller, Rumson, N. J. Errol Flynn's latest picture is "The Perfect Specimen." Joan Blondell plays opposite him.

A. Rothenberger, Orchard Park, N. Y. Tyrone Power is the son of the late Tyrone Sr., and was not adopted. He has one sister.

R. W. Marshall, Excelsior Springs, Mo. Address your request for pictures of the Mauch twins to Warner Brothers, Burbank, California. Enclose twenty-five cents for each photograph desired. Address Freddie Bartholomew, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, California.

Rhoda Newman, Brooklyn, N. Y. Judy Garland is thirteen years old, is four feet eleven inches tall and weighs ninety-five pounds. Ray Milland is married to a non-professional.

Willette Stasik, Duquesne, Pa. The young man you refer to, who played the role of Dick Grovernor in "Stella Dallas," is Tim Holt. He is the son of Jack Holt and has just been signed to a contract by Walter Wanger. Address him Walter Wanger Productions, United Artists, Hollywood, California.

Ida Blanche Stage, Chattanooga, Tenn. At this writing Sonja Henie is still number one girl with Tyrone Power, so don't believe those rumors about Loretta Young, Janet Gaynor, etc.

Jane Snow, New Rochelle, N. Y. Errol Flynn is twenty-eight years old.

Janet Vermillion, Washington, D. C. Write Nelson Eddy care of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, California.

Mrs. L. Anderson, Milwaukee, Wis. Carol Hughes is the girl who played opposite Joe E. Brown in "The Earthworm Tractor."

Sylvia Plachinski, Cudahy, Wis. It would seem you like Myrna Loy! Well, here goes: She has dark red hair, has a stand-in and is now settled in her new home in Cold Water Canyon. She married Arthur Hornblow in 1936. The question as to salary we are unable to answer.

They're having trouble casting Miss Mitchell's famous hit—
I'll have to take my pen in hand and help them out a bit.
Now, first there's Walter Connolly—I choose him for O'Hara—
Who so right as Walter for the bouncing Squire of Tara?
I'd have the little Allan girl for Ashley's gentle wife;
Poor Ashley couldn't be miscast more than he was in life.
And Ronald Colman I would cast to play the part of Rhett;
Of course, he's not a Southerner—he's English born—and yet
How eloquent his silences—his speech, oh, how laconic,
And, oh, this Englishman can be so terribly sardonic!
But Scarlett, no, I can't cast her—the soulless little harlot;
I hope no woman ever lived who fits the part of Scarlett!

Chastising the Chatterers

Somebody invariably shrieks, "Look out, Bob!" when some new, cute-looking youth crashes the local theatre's screen. Any minute you'd expect Robert Taylor to be shoved right off the screen for keeps. The endless stream of chatterers who are willing to bet most anything that Bob's downfall will be greater and much more rapid than his quick rise, must expect more than a million admirers to suddenly forget that there ever was a Robert Taylor and start ranting about a new rising star whose career is anything but stable at present.

I can't find anything anywhere that gives definite proof that Bob is waning in box office or fan mail pull. Yes, new boys are headed for the top at a steady pace, but they have done that ever since Adam.

The screen needs a variety of new personalities. The new ones will eventually take their places, but just as Fredric March said in "A Star Is Born," they will be ready for their curtain when the time comes. Until that happens, my guess is that Taylor won't grow grey hair over "threatening" males.—Gordon Blackwell, Orlando, Fla.

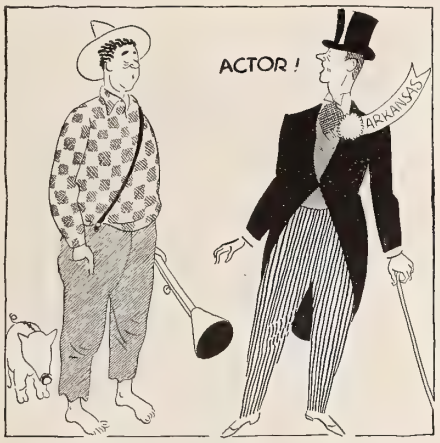
Battle Royal



Back in seventeen seventy-six,
This country was in a terrible fix,
The Red-coats and farmers were having their fights,
But now look at the Taylor and Tyroneites.

Across the country is raging a battle,
That can be heard from Savannah to Seattle.
From the young school girl to the old schoolmarm
Pour indignant letters filled with alarm
Over some snippy, uncultured flirt
Who had actually dared to assert
That handsome, sparkling Tyrone Power
Made Taylor look like a wilted flower,
And ardent fans had better not go
When Taylor was advertised at the show.

'N' ME

For it simply couldn't be a wow
With an actor (?) like S. Arlington Brugh.

Oh, Robert is handsome and full of wit,
All this and more I'm compelled to admit,

An Arkansan's candid opinion of Bob Burns is more bitter than 'tis sweet.

But what wouldn't I give for one measly hour
With a charming chap by the name of Power!

—Jeanne L. Stark, St. Louis, Mo.

$1.00 Prize Letter
Patriotism or Temper

You may call this a letter of patriotism, criticism, or an outburst of temper. I call it another Arkansawyer's candid opinion of Bob Burns!

It seems as if Arkansas is one of the most ridiculed states in the Union, and I fail to see why, as would anyone who would care to investigate our state's history.

I think vigorously, savagely and furiously that the antics and so-called witticisms of Mr. Burns are nothing short of treason to our state. That anyone would poke fun at and make his state the goat of so many ignorant jibes is unthinkable. To become famous by making humorous films about the hospitable, loyal and intelligent people who claim Arkansas as their beloved home is not only very unjust but also dishonorable.

Bob Burns may be world-famous, but a few more pictures similar to "Mountain Music" will only increase the hostile feelings of his native friends. I'm from Arkansas and proud of it, and I don't see why Bob Burns shouldn't be, too.—Grayce Higginbotham, Nettleton, Ark.

$1.00 Prize Letter
Backing Up Ginger

If Ginger Rogers wants to go dramatic, I'm here to back her up. I would very much like to see her in some more non-musical roles again. Remember that splendid detective film, "Star of Midnight," that she made with William Powell and those hilarious comedy sequences? And, too, that film she whipped up with Lyle Talbot called "A Shriek in the Night?" It mightn't have been an epic, but it had what every film needs—entertainment. I'm waiting for "Stage Door," for I have faith that Ginger will outshine Katharine Hepburn.

Now, don't get me wrong. My liking for the Astaire and Rogers team hasn't chilled. But I would like to see Ginger a versatile actress. Look at Irene Dunne. She switched from a musical, "Showboat," to comedy, "Theodora Goes Wild," and did a swell dramatic job in "Magnificent Obsession." So why can't Ginger Rogers? Please let her strut her stuff with Mr. Astaire and without him. Ginger's fans will back her up!—Josephine Crutcher, So. Boca Grande, Fla.

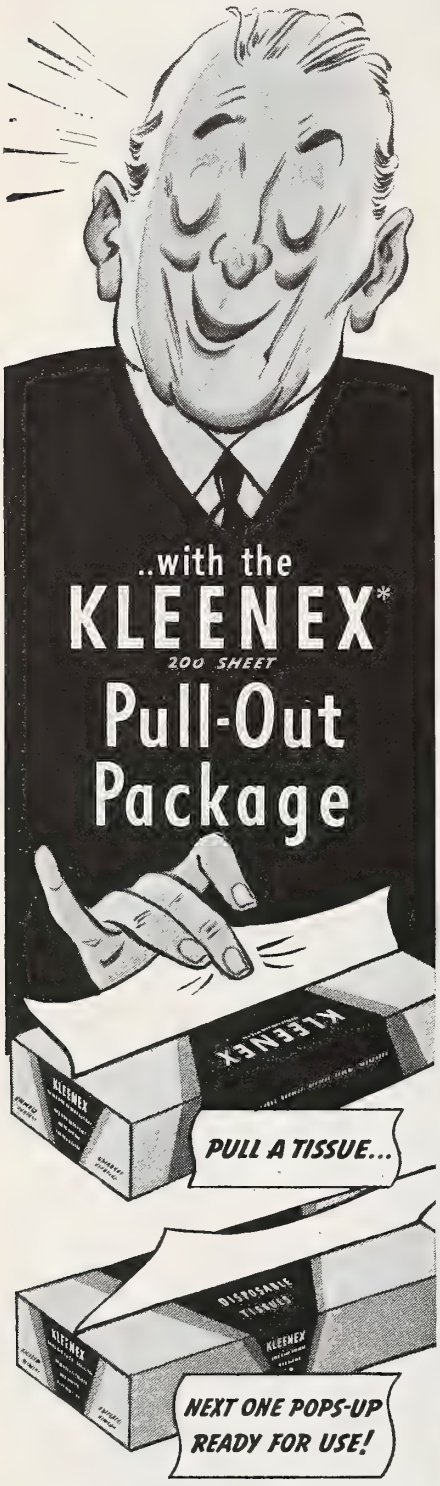
Those Misplaced Eyebrows



Something ought to be done about those slim-looking mustaches appearing on the upper lips of such movie personages as Errol Flynn, Clark Gable and Don Ameche. A real honest-to-goodness mustache lends quite an air to a certain sophisticated type of face or can (so I'm told) cover a defective mouth or a weak one. But these misplaced eyebrows do nothing but annoy.

As far as good looks go, the Messrs. Flynn, Gable and Ameche have nothing to hide, so why in Heaven's name they have affected these awful things is a mystery to me. What are they trying to do—look like Jack Oakie?—Dorothy Reilly, Pelham, N. Y.

Joan Fontaine, blonde sister of Olivia De Havilland, got a break when she was given the role opposite Fred Astaire in "Damsel in Distress." Doubles don't get much credit, but this one drew down a hundred dollars a week for floating about in the arms of Astaire.

One of the tragedies of Hollywood is that a star can't afford much publicity of the wrong type. Often, when a player is being maligned in the public prints, there are other angles to the case which the reader never knows about. Such, according to those close to it, is the situation with George Brent. Since he lost his recent suit for annulment of his marriage to Constance Worth, Brent has been stamped as a villain by thousands of letters to the studio. Yet, people who know the couple say that if the whole truth could be aired, Mr. B. would appear in an entirely different light.

Turn to our Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. It's a valuable guide in choosing entertainment. Instead of giving the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

stick him in his little tummy, but he never says a word and he feels all right, so I guess they don't. Maybe he chews the points off before he swallows them. I certainly hope so.

THEN Spunky, my Shetland pony, he eats dog biscuits. Did you ever hear of a pony eating dog biscuits? D'you suppose he thinks he's a dog? It's just terrible because, no matter how many biscuits you give him, he always wants more, and he steals them away from the poor little dogs. And then Red, he's the parrot, he tries to steal his meat. Red is just a crazy bird. He's always having arguments with my dogs, he tries to chase them away from the pans when they have their dinner, and he squawks and squawks and they bark and bark, and there's plenty of racket, I can tell you. Red just argues with anybody. I guess he's a born arguer, he walks up and down the wall and talks to the horses. And when the horses don't pay attention, he drops his bowl of food with an awful bang and he yells, "Fire, fire, shut the door." He thinks he's scaring somebody, but shucks, we all know Red, we just let him yell.

I wish you could see Spunky, though. He's the darlingest pony, he knows all kinds of tricks. He can bow, and he can kneel, and he can roll over and lie down. I mean, if he wants to, he can, but Spunky likes to tease you. Sometimes I want to show people how cute he is, and I say "Bow, Spunky," and he just kind of squats down and looks at me. And he won't even budge, no matter how many times you ask him, and you can give him sugar and everything, and he just looks at you. Then if you go quietly away and peek around the corner, there's Spunky bowing and kneeling and rolling over all by himself, and kind of laughing out of the corner of his eye. I guess he likes jokes, too.

I don't know if it's more fun at home or the studio. At home I have a red and white playroom, because red is my favorite color. I wanted my bedroom to be red, too, but Mommy said blue is more restfuler, so I said all right, because I like blue, too. But red is my favorite. What's yours? I read in my playroom, and at night Mommy reads to me in bed. She's just reading me "Tom Sawyer." Isn't that a beautiful book? I love the Bible stories, too, especially the one about Lazarus. I don't know why, I just like it best.

ONCE in a while I do something I think is fun, but Mommy doesn't. Like one day I thought I'd have a pie factory, so I baked some pies out of sawdust and mud and I made a sign, "Shirley's Pie Factory," and I stood outside the gate and I yelled, "Wanta buy a pie? Wanta buy a pie?" And all the cars stopped and bought my pies. One lady wanted to send it back to where she lived, Cincinutti or something, but I told her it wouldn't keep, so she said she'd put it in a bottle. I made twenty-seven cents, that's quite a lot for mudpies, but then Mommy found me and thought I better stop.

The lady says I can tell anything I like, so I'd like to tell about Honolulu. I was just there not long ago, when I had my vacation When you have your vacation I hope you go there, too, because they have beautiful flowers and a nice long ride on a boat and little brown babies and flying fish. At first you think they're birds, but they're

Consult a Doctor instead of a Lawyer

The simple "Lysol" method of feminine hygiene has ended many a "misunderstanding"

MANY a neglected wife would get a happier solution of her problem, if she consulted a doctor instead of a lawyer. For very often, a husband's neglect arises from a wife's failure to keep herself immaculately, intimately clean.

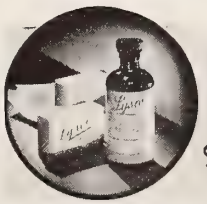
Are you sure you haven't been guilty of carelessness in your own personal hygiene? You may not be aware of this offense. Yet it may be intolerable to others; particularly to your husband. Better learn about "Lysol".

Too many women fail in this matter of personal daintiness. If the truth were known, "incompatibility" often means ignorance of correct feminine hygienic measures for cleanliness.

Ask your doctor about "Lysol" disinfectant. For more than 50 years "Lysol" has been recommended by many doctors, and used by countless women, for antiseptic feminine hygiene. "Lysol" is widely used by the medical and nursing professions, for exacting antiseptic needs. There are many valuable personal and household uses for "Lysol", and every druggist carries it.

THE 6 SPECIAL FEATURES OF "LYSOL"

1. NON-CAUSTIC..."Lysol" in the proper dilution, is gentle and reliable. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.



2. EFFECTIVENESS..."Lysol" is a powerful germicide, active under practical conditions ...effective in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.).

3. PENETRATION..."Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.

4. ECONOMY..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.

5. ODOR...The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears after use.

6. STABILITY..."Lysol" keeps its full strength no matter how long it is kept, no matter how often it is uncorked.

"THIS FLAVOR'S GOT SOMETHING"

"A dash and a lilt—a fresh, wake-you-up taste that's deliciously smooth and lasting. Beeman's flavor exactly suits me! And that ingenious airtight package keeps it right at the high pitch of fresh perfection."

"But gracious, man, you've left out the very reason half the people we know buy Beeman's—they choose it as a delightful way to top off 'most every meal, because Beeman's not only tastes grand but actually helps digestion!"

Beeman's

not birds at all. They come right out of the waves with their little silver stomachs, and then bing! they go in again, and they don't even make the teeniest splash.

The first time you go to Honolulu, you're malahini—that means stranger, because you never were there before. If you go again, you're kamaaina—that means you stopped being a stranger and belong there. This time I was kamaaina. They have nice words in Honolulu, but I'm certainly glad I don't have to spell them.

All the people came on the boat and they sang Aloha. It means, "How are you, we're glad to see you, welcome." And they sang "The Good Ship Lollypop," too. That was a song in a picture with my friend, Jimmy Dunn. And oh my! the leis. Everybody gives you leis. Mine were mostly pikaki leis, they look like popcorn but they smell even nicer. I had so many, they stuck off my arms and shoulders, and the only thing was I didn't have room to carry my boy doll, Jimmy. It was all right, except he'd rather have me carry him. But when I saw him in the hotel, what do you think? He had a lei, too, so I guess he didn't mind, because on account of the lei he knew they were glad to see him. That's what it means, you know.

SOME of my friends I met the last time came on the boat. One was Captain Wilson, he belongs to the American Navy. And one was Tai Sing Loo, he takes pictures and he has two little girls my size. One little girl didn't like her name, but she likes Shirley, so now her name is Shirley. I think that's pretty funny. She just said, "I don't like my name, so now I'm Shirley." I guess it's a pretty good thing I like Shirley, because if I said, "I don't like my name, so now I'm Barbara," I don't know if they'd let me change it.

My friend Duke Kahanamoku came, but I call him Duke, because the rest is too long. He's very strong. He's so strong, he carried me down to the dock on his shoulders. I'm pretty heavy all by myself, but being full of leis made me good and heavy, so you can imagine how strong he is. He didn't seem to care any more than if I was a fly, and it was nice riding way up high like that. Then we rode to the hotel, and it was an open car, and people threw leis at us. One hit me right in the nose. I had to laugh, because it was so awfully soft and smelled so very good.

We used to go swimming in a pool, and there was a little girl named June and a little girl named Martha, and a little dog named Bozo. Bozo was a white little dog with black ears and a black tail, and oh my! how he did love to go swimming in the water. He'd just plunk right in and go swimming round and round, with his black ears sticking up. And if you called him, he wouldn't listen. You'd think he was in a race or something, he'd swim so hard. Then he'd jump out and shake all the water off and look around as if he was proud of himself, and we'd say, "Hooray, Bozo, you're almost as good as Duke." He wasn't really, of course, because Duke is a champion, but I guess if there were dog champions, Bozo would certainly be one.

There was an octopus in the aquarium who didn't like me. I don't know why, I never did anything to him. I just put my hands on the glass to see him better, but other people put their hands on the glass, too, and he didn't seem to care, he just floated around. Only when I did it, he ran clear to the back of the tank and he turned white. Honestly he did. He was a gray octopus, and he just turned white, and some ink came running out of him, and then he flew at me. My goodness, I was scared. I forgot about the glass being there and I jumped way back, and then when he didn't see me any more, he turned gray again.

The man who takes care of the aquarium told me to go back, and I did, on account of the glass being there. That's what made me brave. I went back and I said to that old octopus, "Ni men shih yin' shih shu ni?" That means in Chinese, "Are we mice or men?" I learned it in "Stowaway," and I say it when anything tries to scare me. But I guess that octopus didn't understand Chinese, because the minute he saw me, he started bouncing round and turning white again. The man said he was frightened, because I didn't have a hat on, and he doesn't like the shine the sun makes on yellow hair. So if you have yellow hair, you better wear a hat when you go to see the octopus in Honolulu. That's all I can tell you. If it's black, you don't have to bother.

WE went across the Pali to see David, my friend I met when I was there two years ago. He has a grass shack to live in and a mat he sleeps on, and a wife and a little baby. He had the shack and the mat before, but the baby is new.

The Pali is a mountain where a king used to throw his enemies over the cliff. Goodness, that's a high cliff. I'm certainly glad I wasn't that king's enemy. There's a nice thing up there, too, it's the Aloha rock. It just looks like a rock, but if you say Aloha to it, you have good luck. Some of the people didn't want to bother getting out of the car, so I had to make them. I didn't want to be a nuisance, but I wanted them to have good luck.

There were some jokes in Honolulu, too. You can find jokes almost everywhere, I guess. F'rinstance, they have an outrigger canoe, and the man said, "It's a Samoan canoe." So I asked him if he was going to canoe some more. I knew it wasn't a some-more-an canoe, I was just pretending, because I thought it was a good joke. I like to laugh. The man laughed, too.

But I wasn't pretending about the night-blooming cereus. It's a flower and it only blooms at night, in the daytime it's all closed up. We went out to see it bloom. When you put your hand inside, it feels so nice and cool. I thought it was a serious kind of flower, but Mommy said no, it was a different kind of cereus, and just a name. That wasn't a joke, it was just not knowing the difference.

Daddy bought me a ukelele, and I learned to play on it a little. I used to say u-kelele, but now I say oo-kelele, because that's how they say it in Honolulu, and it's their word, so they ought to know. I asked the man who gave me lessons what it meant, and it means jumping flea, because your fingers jump around like fleas when you play on it. I learned how to play "My Little Red Opoo"——that's a very funny song, because "opoo" means stomach, and it's all about a malahini who doesn't know how hot the sun is in Honolulu, so he lies on the beach and gets his poor little stomach all red and sunburned. I guess it wouldn't be so funny if it really happened, but it's only a song.

When we went away, they sang Aloha again. It means hello, but it means goodbye, too, and we like you, and we hope you'll come back some time. I never saw a word that meant such a lot of lovely things. So I guess I'll say aloha now to all.

Your friend,
SHIRLEY TEMPLE.

You'll talk about the Anita Louise story—in January Modern Screen

first time we've met since the days when we were that way about each other. I used to run around with a whole crowd of newspapermen and Ronald was one of them. And we were so-o-o enamored of one another—until I introduced him to Una Merkel at a party. Well," and Rochelle shrugged a shoulder, "they liked each other just too well and were married in less than a month.

"When such crises arise in my life, I just remind myself fast of some tried-and-true statements. You know, check it up to profit and loss and call it experience; all's fair in love and war; men are like street cars with another along in a minute; it was a lot of fun while it lasted. Oh, there's any number you can whip up for variation!"

"But isn't it possible that you can be a good sport about such situations because you haven't cared deeply? You've probably never been really in love."

Rochelle suddenly looked up. "In love?" she said quietly. "I doubt if any girl was ever more in love with a man than I, or ever had a heart so completely shattered by it." She fitted a cigarette with great care, into a paper holder before continuing. "But I could take that, too. I even learned to be grateful for it. You see, it taught me how to be happy."

"The secret," she continued thoughtfully, "is to never put your whole faith in any one person. Have enough in yourself so that life can never leave you in the lurch."

"Does that mean that you aren't going to fall in love again?"

"Certainly not! That was three years ago and since then I've been in love plenty of times and will be plenty more, no doubt. But I'm not kidding myself that any of these men have been ideal, or that I'll ever meet up with an ideal man. There's just no such thing. And that's not cynicism—just common sense."

WHAT about marriage? Don't you expect to find someone with whom you can settle down and be happy?"

"Marriage? Oh, certainly, some day. But it won't be any of this little cottage with roses 'round the door and babies on the floor stuff. Uh uh!" She shook her head. "Not for Rochelle! As for happiness, I don't expect to find any! Then I'll be pleasantly surprised if it should come and not a bit disappointed if it doesn't.

"As a matter of fact, I'd marry in a second if I thought I had even a fighting chance of being a little happier than I am right now. But I'd know it was just a chance. Marriage is undoubtedly the biggest gamble in the world. And for me it has to be a strictly fifty-fifty proposition. I wouldn't take any more than I could dish out. Any man whom I marry will have to recognize the fact that I'm an individual and expect to stay that way—as I would expect him to stay. None of this melting into one business for me. It seems to me that two people should try to profit from one another's personalities, not try to absorb them."

"Just what are you looking for in a man you could marry?"

"First of all, a sense of humor. The ability to see how darned funny I look most of the time has been my saving grace. Since I'm not expecting perfection in a man, it's pretty important that he should be able to see how darned funny he looks most of the time.

BEAUTY authorities agree that the most important step in the care of your complexion is thorough cleansing. It's a simple step, too, since Daggett & Ramsdell created Golden Cleansing Cream.

You can't see or feel this colloidal gold, any more than you can see or feel the iron in spinach. "Secondly, I'd have to have a man who was a do-er, with plenty of interests outside of the little wife. Because I couldn't center my life around home and husband—and I wouldn't have children for love or money—it would bore me to death to have anyone around not equally independent. Of course, if I were like most girls, who could be contented with entertaining eight of the girls at the Assistance League or could get a kick out of the Wednesday afternoon bridge club, where talk concerns the latest news in garbage grinders, or the best way to strain the spinach for Junior, it would be different. But none of this settling down to a narrower mind and a broader derriere for me!

"You see," said Rochelle slowly, "I've been close to a lot of break-ups in my day, and I've profited from all of them. I've come to the conclusion that no matter how much two people are in love with each other, they should have such engrossing interests of their own that they'll never be dependent on one another to the point of boredom. Then, too, they'll always have something to fall back on if the marriage goes on the rocks. By an engrossing interest I don't mean, necessarily, a career.

"In my case, I could give up the picture business and still have a hundred ways in which to keep myself interested every minute—music, dancing, painting, any number of things. And I'd have to marry a man as self-sufficient. Love is like fried chicken, it seems to me. Very nice, of course, but served up for breakfast, lunch and dinner, it's apt to pall.

ANOTHER thing is that he would have to understand that I will have other men in my life. I couldn't give them up, you see, since I'd be giving up my only friends. He'd have to have enough trust in me to know that should I happen to lunch with a producer, I wasn't taking a short-cut to a contract."

"What about marrying a man in the motion picture business? Do you think you'd have as good a chance to make a go of that?"

"Probably much better," Rochelle said. "In the first place, we have a language all our own here in Hollywood. I've certainly found that out after going with a good many men not in the movie game. For instance, mention a grip and they think your thoughts are not of the highest. On the other hand, stocks and bonds, insurance and other businesses have often proved so much Greek to me. Then, too, people in this business realize the odds they're up against and work harder to save their marriages. Though compared to a good many other places in this country, Hollywood is in the Sunday-school class if the truth were known," she added.

"You evidently bet on Hollywood."

"Hollywood? Well, maybe I'm wrong, but I think it's a grand town. And working in pictures is a grand job. But it isn't my whole life by any means. The picture business can't make me forget that there are a great many other things older in the world than the invention of celluloid. I'm not the kind that eats, drinks and sleeps movies. Unless something unforeseen happens, I'm through work at six o'clock, like any other girl in any other job, and ready to take off for some extra-curricular activities.

"A round of every cocktail bar in town, maybe, or just playing ping-pong in someone's rumpus-room, or dancing all night at some swank spot or racing a boat by moonlight in the Santa Monica harbor—doing any number of things that are fun. I'm always ready for anything, which accounts more than anything else, I know, for my popularity with men. For instance, this evening I'm flying to Yuma with Lee Bowman." Lee Bowman, you know, is that attractive young movie newcomer.

"Oh, no Yumatrimonial intentions!" she laughed. "Just for the ride! I like to do crazy things like that. It's nine-tenths of the fun of living."

Life must always have been a lark, we reflected, for anyone like this girl—so lovely looking, so vivacious.

"Don't you ever believe it!" and there was a note of bitterness in Rochelle's voice. "True, I'm a successful actress at twenty-two, I have a substantial income, a beautiful home, cars, clothes and more opportunities for good times than I can find hours in the day to cram in. But any girl who envies my present position should take into consideration some of the grueling years behind me. Take my high-school days. That's the time when most girls have the happiest years of their lives—parties, clubs, close friends and all that. Well, I missed out on that.

"I was too busy taking dancing lessons and all the other necessary lessons when I wasn't actually at the studio. Then the rest of the time I had to go to regular school, which was just as well," she added, "for the girls at high-school snubbed me beautifully and the boys couldn't see me for dirt.

"The trouble, of course, with any girl who is set for a career, is that she associates so much with older people that she becomes far more advanced mentally than girls and boys of her own age. And she's still too young to really enjoy the company of older people. There's probably no misery in this world greater than that of a girl who's completely left out of all the fun which she sees around her during these adolescent years. Of course, now," said Rochelle, "I can see that it was worth it; that I was building for a future. But there are definitely two sides to this career business, and any girl considering it should have it pretty clear in her own mind whether the end will justify the means."

ROCHELLE, you know, started her picture career at fourteen, when she was given a leading role in "Are These Our Children?" But she had started rigorous training for it by the time she was three. Her mother, who had always wanted to be an actress herself, brought her small daughter to Hollywood from Oklahoma and began then to give her the necessary training—posture, diction, voice, dramatic lessons from the best teachers she could afford. That all this was good ground-work was proved by Rochelle's steady progress when she once was started in the business. To this day she has never had to ask for a role, for producers and directors know that Rochelle has two invaluable traits which they have frequent need of—ability and dependability.

"They know, you see," Rochelle said, "that I've never given a performance that frankly smelled. They know that I've built up a reputation to the extent that I can go into a picture and carry it. And that is the very thing that's proving my undoing. For they figure that all they have to do is put a yard of ruffles around my neck and send me in."

Her eyes flashed as she said, "All these lilies and blue birds are getting in my hair—all these namby-pamby roles, and all the publicity that's dished out to go with them. I'm sick of waving the Janet Gaynor banner when there are plenty of others to do that. I know that I can handle dramatic roles which not only interpret, but require, a deep understanding of life. After all, sophistication is simply intelligence. And I want the chance to prove that the real Rochelle Hudson is sophisticated!"

veritable Alps. I'd wonder furiously how on earth I'd ever stumbled into such a mess, and why it had been inflicted on me.

"I had to begin my acting by touring the provincial theatres, of course, so when I got my first chance at a play in London, I was ecstatic. My supreme victory was only around the corner! My father, you see, hadn't liked my going on the stage at all, but my mother had stood up for me and this vindication was to be spectacular.

"However, I met a clever agent who insisted that I go to a picture studio and try out for the lead in the most important film then being cast. I'd never seen the inside of a studio. Many established actresses had already been tested for this part. Somehow they rushed a print of my test through and before I departed that evening I was offered a contract for the picture at what was a fabulous sum to me. I remember sitting up until three a.m. debating with myself. Here was the miraculous sudden fame I'd dreamed about, guaranteed!

"The film proposition was too tempting. I deserted the stage and I was an overnight hit on the screen. Yes, but do you know what's liable to be the follow-up to such luck? What happened to me afterwards was nothing! Actually, I couldn't get a job acting on either screen or stage. I was dazed when finally I realized my predicament. Furthermore, I was totally unprepared for possible failure. My first major mistake was becoming conceited. I believed my own publicity. They'd taken me after considering so many others, they'd starred me and sent out reams of flattering words. Then, although I was all right in my performance, they had nothing else for me.

"That lull that inevitably catches up with you sometimes, caught me when I'd blithely spent all my big salary with lavish ease. I was a star, and no longer need I quibble about small change. So I'd moved from my boarding-house to a flat that was a proper setting. And not until the memory of my performance began to fade, not until there was no more money rolling in, did I recognize how silly I'd been. Spectacular vindication? I had to fold my feathers and creep out of my grandeur. I was walking again to save carfare. I was glad I'd invested in some clothes. Eventually I secured another role.

"My next mistake came after I was fairly well set in pictures. I hungered for greater versatility. I wasn't content with scoring in my particular line. When, in a story that was written for me, the other woman turned out to be more interesting, I determined that I could be equally effective in an unsympathetic role, as a 'heavy.'

"I mangled my make-up in my zeal. I threw overboard all my own carefully-acquired personality. And what thanks did I get? Absolutely none. The picture was a magnificent flop because I was a disappointment to everyone who'd begun to like me. The public resented my switch. I discovered then that on the screen you can't attempt to be radically different from your natural type. Perhaps this is casually put, but it was no casual lesson. I was a very sad 'heavy' and the sad fact was apparent to everybody. It took time to make people forget that mistake. I had to work harder

"Men are such BABIES!"

"...especially about colds...I have to look out for Jack's just the same as Junior's..."

"You know how men are. Careless about bad weather. Hate umbrellas and overshoes. When they start sneezing, can't be bothered with doing anything about it. Then, when a cold gets 'em down—what a fuss!

"Jack used to get one cold after another. Honest, he wasn't fit to live with half the winter. But this fall I decided I wasn't going to put up with it. So I started giving my big baby the sort of care I'd been giving my little one.

"The very next time Jack came home sneezing, he got Vicks Va-tro-nol—quick!—3 or 4 drops right up each nostril. 'Lot o' good that'll do me,' he grumbled. But an hour or so later I caught him using Va-tro-nol all by himself. And, fortunately, that's all there was to that cold.

"He still takes some watching, but he admits that Va-tro-nol has helped him dodge a lot of those nasty head colds he used to get. 'Course, some colds get by in spite of all you can do. But they don't get by for long in our house any more.

"When Jack gets a cold I give his chest—and back, too—a good massage with Vicks VapoRub. He growls some, but I know he likes it. Junior gets the same treatment. I like it especially for him because the doctor doesn't want me 'dosing' him a lot, for fear of upsetting his little tummy.

"I get Jack to treat me the same way, too. The rubbing feels so good when your chest is all tight and achy with a cold. And, all the time, you're breathing in those VapoRub vapors!

"Pretty soon, you feel relaxed and comfortable again and can usually sleep as sound as if you'd never had a cold at all."

Both Va-tro-nol and VapoRub have been doubly proved for you—by everyday use in millions of homes, and by the largest clinical tests ever made on colds. For full details of these huge tests, see the folder—"Vicks Plan for Better Control of Colds"—which comes in each Vicks package.

than ever before to prove that I wasn't merely a gaga ingenue after that debacle. I had to work against the conviction that I wasn't much of an actress for I'd been so unconvincing in that one film."

She was being so candid that I was seeing, at last, the human person behind the familiar star personality.

"A producer asked me recently if I'd care to do an unsympathetic role. 'It would win you praise from the critics,' he pointed out. 'They'd say how brave you'd been to essay it.' My answer was no, and I related to him exactly this experience I've told you about. A woman, be she actress or small-town girl, cannot repeat her mistakes. Not if she wishes to escape inevitable penalties for stupidity. It's too dangerous to risk a blunder if you think you foresee disaster. So far as the critics' praises go, I love them. But they don't matter compared to whether the audience approves or shakes its head. I know.

"My subsequent boner," she adores American slang, "was in being highbrow toward pictures. I preferred the stage emphatically. Movies weren't arty enough for me. I resolved, therefore, to use them just as a weapon against the world. I'd accumulate fifteen thousand dollars and then I'd have no more to do with them. I'd concentrate on the theatre and I'd always be certain of eating. I'd never have to go crawling back to papa. But after alternating screen and stage, after coming to Hollywood and learning how well pictures can be made, I climbed off my high horse. I discovered that there is true artistry in pictures. Now I love acting in them, and to think I might have cut off all this for a mistaken whim!

"What rescued me for this most enjoyable future was my marriage. I'd almost amassed my secret fortune when Philip and I had to confess to one another that life without love was pretty dull. He taught me to relax, to view acting with a better perspective.

"I didn't guess where our friendship would lead us, though, and so I made quite a mistake about love. I thought I was the woman who could do nicely without it. I contended it couldn't mix with a career. Why, I gave out terrific quotes on why a career woman could never make a success of matrimony. I blush to recall that I even wrote an article myself, painstakingly expounding on why I'd avoid the wedding ring. I blush because Philip and I eloped while that article was fresh on the newsstands! I overestimated my one-track career mind, and underestimated my common sense. For it's as simple as this: if a man can work and still be a good husband, so can a woman!

"The worst mistakes we stumble into are usually unconscious ones, don't you think? You found me here, dawdling over a cup of coffee. But I finished 'It's All Yours' for Columbia recently, and I don't work all the time. I learned not to. I had to learn this. For after I married Philip I had a nervous breakdown to teach me. A nervous breakdown on a grand honeymoon! That was being taught, believe me.

"But I'd made seven pictures and played leads in four plays in London, all within one year. I was too ambitious. I was wound up without realizing it, and I nearly wrecked myself. It got so I couldn't relax. Philip had to show me how. I'd gone about acting so doggedly. He had to say, 'You're not a person anymore, you're an automaton!' He had to beguile me into resting, into fighting for my health once more. Yes, I knew exhaustion and what a mistake it is to deliberately let yourself in for that!"

She couldn't be profound any longer. With a flip of her finger she dismissed the gloves that had roused such memories.

"There are a couple of minor mistakes lurking in my past," she declared with her customary gaiety. "I turned down 'Cavalcade' because, imagine, I fancied it would be a failure! I figured they'd have to Americanize the play to make it appealing, but they didn't and still, I'm not sorry! That offer came within a year after I was married and certainly that was far too soon to consider parting from Philip for any distant glory.

"Once upon a time, only once, I made that blunder known as letting your temper go haywire. It was back in England and I'd worked late. I was tired and asked for a studio car to take me home. They didn't seem to be obliging and so I stamped my feet and screamed. P.S.: I didn't get the car and I am positive I made a perfect fool of myself!"

Such a lucky lady? Yes, and such a smart one. Madeleine Carroll has everything a woman could want now, because she refused to be defeated by her mistakes and because she never leads with her chin twice.

draped with Phi Beta Kappa keys.

"I believe in what we can do in pictures. I know it. The camera can all but call the dead back to life again. It can disinter a story from the darkest archives of time. It can take down the front walls of hospitals and palaces where history is being made, research laboratories and planetariums, the dens of gangsters, prisons and drawing rooms and expose the life that goes on within all of these places. I would like to do my part in taking down these walls until, from the beginning, from the amoeba up to the present day, all life would be revealed upon the screen for those who cannot read as well as for the literate and learned.

"I would like to see history made so stirring, so pulse-shaking that every man, woman and child in the land would come into possession of his country's history for the first time, really, through the medium of the eyes and ears.

"Why, don't you see, for the first time in all the world we have it within our power to make education and entertainment one and the same thing? For the first time we have the ability to educate the people without their knowing what is happening to them. Until, one day, the many millions would be literate, would be speaking with many tongues of many things. Would come, at long last, into their rightful heritage of the rich stores of knowledge, into an understanding of their fellow men, such men, as, say, Rhodes, the Empire Builder, Louis Pasteur and, such fellows, warped, as Danny. It could be, it is, a tremendous adventure. It should be a magnificent obsession. I share with Rhodes his feeling when, dying, he said 'So much to do, so little done.'

"I work at being a better actor," Bob continued earnestly (we were lunching together in the studio commissary at the time Bob was making "Live, Love and Learn," with Rosalind Russell). And yet I don't know that I can define, very intelligently, just what it is I do. It's an intangible sort of thing, an actor's off-screen work. It consists, largely, in reading. I spend most of my leisure time reading plays, plays, more plays. I read biographies, the better novels, memoirs. I watch people constantly, everywhere. I almost sleep with one eye open, lest some member of my family walk in his sleep and I be enabled to make a mental note of his expression. I never go to a football game that I don't study the faces of the players, and the crowd. I may not know the final score but I do know how the players looked when they scored or missed.

"I went, recently, to a championship golf match. I followed the contender around the course all day. With one objective. I knew that he was nervous, must have been nervous. I wanted to find out how he revealed his nervousness. And not until the end of the day did I find out. A nerve in his thumb joint was twitching. That was all. I watch a man with a gun, the way he always stands with his feet far apart, braced. You may hand a man a gun in a living room, in a field, anywhere, and he will, instantly, spread his legs apart and take a stance. I may never consciously, or at all, copy any of these mannerisms, these reactions. But all such observation is the homework of an actor and enrichens his perceptions, his basic knowledge of the way human nature reacts under given conditions and stimuli.

THERE are parts of my work I detest. I am abominably lazy, physically. I am not an 'outdoor' type. We have a farm in New York State, as you know. I am a farmer, so-called. A gentleman-farmer, we hope. But I remain indoors as much as possible. I am not at home among the rows of growing corn, the onions and the leeks. The sky is not my natural canopy nor yet the earth my bed. Similarly, and for much the same reasons, I detest location trips. I am an actor, Madam, and accustomed to darkened pits, gloomy wings, the dust-laden air, the kliegs. God's sunshine and the sage-sweet air offends the nostrils of this one of God's troupers. Am I a beagle that I should work out of doors?

"And now," said Bob, as we finished Bob's favorite and daily luncheon of chicken salad, rye-bread toast and milk, "and now, I want to ask my public, my fans, if any, a question. I want them to tell me what they want me to do next. I want them to tell me, honestly, whether they prefer me to do, not other 'Night Must Falls,' too many murders would be as deplorable as too many monkeyshines, but other more serious, more thoughtful roles. I hope they will tell me. Will you ask them to? I would count it a favor."

citizen, combining the wisdom of the East with the practicality of the West.

If you think you are confused about all this East and West business, you're right in the same boat with Miss Wong. For, it was in order to straighten herself out on it that she finally went to China for her first real vacation. Of course, she had planned to go for years, but whenever she had the money she didn't have the time, or vice versa. Then Metro began casting "The Good Earth." They summoned Anna May to take a test for the important role of Lotus.

"I'll be glad to take the test, but I won't play the part," said Miss Wong. "If you let me play O-lan, I'll be very glad. But you're asking me—with Chinese blood—to do the only unsympathetic role in a picture featuring an all-American cast portraying Chinese characters."

The test was made and the studio most insistent, but Anna May was firm in her refusal and decided that this was the time to see China.

"You know," she commented, "I had to be sure whether I was really playing a Chinese or merely giving an American interpretation of one. So—I saw China. Much to my surprise, I needed a dialect interpreter, for I spoke Cantonese and so in Shanghai was at a total loss, with Shanghai-ese being spoken on all sides.

I'M afraid that I'm a woman without a country," lamented Miss Wong, "because when I was in China everyone asked, 'Who is that Chinese girl in foreign dress?' I had only my American clothes and so decided to have some Eastern costumes made. I summoned a tailor in Shanghai and he came with a long piece of string and took my measurements. With the string, he measured my neck and tied a knot, then my arm length and tied another, then my waist, and another on to the end. I asked how in the world he ever remembered which was which, but he didn't seem confused and I later discovered that over there it seems you simply can't make a mistake.

"Once I changed to Oriental dress, I thought I might recede into the background and just enjoy being in China. But, no. Everyone who saw me now asked, 'Who is that foreign girl in Chinese dress?' So what is there to do? It all seems equivalent to that Great Chinatown Trunk Mystery you hear so much about, but never see!"

In answer to our query about the life in Shanghai, Anna May explained, "The night life there is so hectic that Paris or New York gaiety is child's play by comparison. Why, if you go to bed before four in the morning, you're a sissy. No adult with a mind of his own ever turns in before five or six. They can do more after sundown and before dawn than we do in America in a week-end.

"While abroad, I was visited by the gentlemen of the press. During an interview they asked about my private life. 'What about romance, Miss Wong? You know the people of Japan and China are interested in this side of your life, too.'

"I was so tired of being asked that question that I told them I was going to wed my art. Of course, I thought that that bromide had reached the East years ago, but to my surprise, it had not. Next day I was amazed to see headlines stating, 'Miss Anna May Wong to wed wealthy Cantonese merchant named Art!' Would you believe it?"

During her ten months in China, Miss Wong thrilled to the beauty and charm of old customs. She didn't care too much for the modern metropolis of Shanghai, but really began to love China once she was in Peiping. Here she felt that she really began to live again. Most of her time was spent in the country and visiting old ruins, which seemed more alive than many of the newer sections. This she explained was due to the fact, that, even though they are in a state of dilapidation, they are still lived in.

CHINA is becoming more and more current-event conscious. Not only are the people interested in what goes on in and outside of their country, but they are particularly interested in Hollywood's idea of Chinese characters. They are so interested in these, in fact, that they ban most of our pictures. This isn't due to narrow-mindedness or prejudice, but simply to the fact that they have seldom beheld a celluloid Chinaman who possesses a particle of decency, sincerity, honesty or any quality that might be termed a virtue. Movieland Chinese are invariably presented as skulking, stoical, villainous characters who "kidnap the papers and tear up the child!"

We are wont to believe that turn about is fair play. And so, perhaps Anna May, as the Chinese lady detective, can pin some dirty deeds on a few American characters for a change. And we proceeded to tell her as much.

"But I wouldn't do it," she returned, with a glint of humor in her dark eyes. "That is, not unless the script called for it. Seriously though, many have an entirely wrong conception of the Chinese as a race. For the most part, they are a very happy-go-lucky people. They are too lazy to be up to mischief. They know what to do about things, but it's just too much trouble to go about it. They are a philosophical lot and take for granted that things will come out anyway, so why bother so much? Not twice in all the months I spent there did I see stoical individuals lurking around. My people have animated faces just as have Americans; in fact, it's only recently that they have become serious about things concerning them at home.

"The difficulty is that in a Chinese family there is a unit within a unit and no one real head of the house to take the initiative and lead. Each unit, from father to son, feels about things in an entirely different manner, and so there is a constant waste of time and energy trying to compromise. You know, with the birth of the Republic has come a new trend of thought and only in the last few years have the people begun to adjust themselves.

"Now, they look upon things with much the same viewpoint as an American would. There is more coöperation and certainly more singleness of purpose. No longer does the family group go their separate ways.

"For this reason," continued Anna May, "I feel that the real Chinese should be shown to the audiences of the world, if only to correct false impressions of the past. And so, with this thought in mind, I was happy to appear in 'Daughter of Shanghai.' Besides, this opportunity enables me to start my Third Beginning in the most unpredictable game in the world—the movies."

Going to a Party?

important evening date when there will be just the two of you and you're not sure of what you're going to do.

But how about those formal evening parties and dances that you know about and plan for weeks ahead of time? I know you've been itching to get on to June's soft-lights-and-sweet-music gowns, and I don't blame you, for they certainly are lovely. Like so many stars, June was a dancer before she made her success on the screen, and ballroom dancing is one of her favorite hobbies. She loves the cool swish of the billowing skirt of her iridescent moire taffeta waltz frock. Demure and youthful are the wide, pointed front lapels and shirred waistline. The bodice with the three tiny velvet bows continues in a straight panel down the front, leaving the fullness to the back. Note the new hemline on the skirt, ankle-length in front and leading out to the graceful train in back. The delicate blue-and-green lights of the taffeta set off her deep blue eyes and blonde hair, and enhance the clarity and beauty of June's faultless complexion. Accent is given to the color of her gown by the gold formal sandals inset with multi-colored stones. A practical note is sounded here, because they have no definite color, but are a combination of many. These sandals and a bag to match can be worn with other evening ensembles.

For very formal engagements, for those state occasions when she wants to look her very best, June wears a stunning black velvet frock, which is her pride and joy. Ideal for the young girl who wants to look sophisticated without adding about fifteen years to her age, is this paradoxical gown. For, from the heart-shaped bodice, peep dainty, feminine, flesh-colored mousseline ruffles that lend an air of little-girl demureness to relieve the sophistication of the black velvet. The Empire decolletage drops off the shoulders and is held up by the triple narrow shoulder-straps, and the skirt is built on graceful circular lines, full and flowing, that go with the winds of movement.

Beneath her full skirt, June's dancing feet will trip the light fantastic shod in comfortable open-toed, open-heeled black sandals, trimmed with silk braid. Her only ornament is a handsome gold clip at the

This smart girl needed lots of wardrobe variety for the winter whirl. She got it, too, and was more fashionably dressed than ever! But spent $40 less than she planned — and put it towards a winter cruise. Here's how it was done . . . She changed a light blue evening dress to Cerise (brilliant pink); dyed a rust afternoon dress Forest Green; changed three faded blouses to Powder Blue, Jade Green, Wine; changed a scarf and a clever evening jacket to Ruby Red and Gold, pale hose left over from summer to the new purply brown tones; dyed white hankies to match blouses and scarfs and give dash to her black dress. bodice. You will note that this young star wears only very plain jewelry or none at all, for she realizes that heavy jewelry is not appropriate for a young girl, and also that unless you can afford the real McCoy, it is in very poor taste to load yourself down with cheap, flashy jewelry. Instead, she prefers to wear a very plain ornament or a bright flower. If orchids are not on your best beau's budget, don't let that worry you or him either. For the flower manufacturers are doing a wonderful job these days, and you can get artificial posies that, sprayed with a touch of scent, will fool even yourself!

The off-the-shoulder line, as shown in this dress, is very important this year and this means that we must pay attention to our hair styles for evening. June's blonde tresses are lovely, framing her face in soft waves. Frances Dee, a vivacious brunette, has designed a hairdress which is very becoming to the gown which drops off the shoulders. It is a charming and quaint coiffure which is created by parting the hair in the center with a nice sleek flatness brushed in on each side. Corkscrew curls complete the picture, arranged in graduated layers. Against the face on each side, two small gardenias are pinned with the most flattering effect imaginable.

So much for the glamor of the frocks, the fabrics, the accessories, and the coiffure. But don't forget that the good old prosaic girdle plays an important part in sustaining the glamorous effect. For a sloppy figure is just not romantic! And this is especially true this year, when so much emphasis is being placed on the feminine silhouette. If you don't need a foundation garment to pull you in some place, you'll want it to push you out, for the formula works both ways, believe it or not! Like exercises, a foundation tends to slenderize the plump, and fill out the slender.

With the proper foundation underneath it all, your frocks will fit you well, and you'll be comfortable in them. And that is most important. June Lang has shown you three of her costumes as suggestions for your party frocks. But be sure that yours will be suitable for your own individual type, that you'll feel well-dressed and comfortable in them. Choose your party frocks carefully, for if you're wearing a dress that takes on your personality, that looks as though it were made for you alone, then you'll have a good time at the party!

that revealed her loneliness in Hollywood, her longing for her husband and her little girl, back in Germany.

The press-agents shuddered. They tried to persuade Marlene not to talk about her Maria. She was supposed to be exotic, unusual, unconventional, unpredictable. Not a typical young mother.

Marlene, at first, did not get the point. Why should anyone expect her to be, off-screen, what she was on the screen? She did not comprehend when they told her, "That's Hollywood." Off the screen, she was a mother. Surely, it was understandable that she should want to talk about her baby. She flatly refused to stop.

But the press-agents did not want her to be understandable. That was just the point. It was to her advantage, as far as publicity went, to be a baffling personality, a woman of mystery. To preserve the illusion it was trying to create, the studio suddenly made it difficult for writers to interview Marlene.

The writers, not suspecting the studio, blared forth that Marlene was "trying to pull a Garbo." She couldn't have liked that. She probably resented it. But she finished what the studio started. She made herself inaccessible.

Soon, she began to acquire a reputation for being elusive off-screen. A reputation for being exotic, unconventional, unpredictable, difficult to understand.

With her husband far away, her constant companion was sombre Josef von Sternberg, an association that gave Marlene a reputation for being sombre, too. And when her husband, Rudolf Sieber, did visit her, taking time off from his own directorial work at the Paramount Studios in Paris, he and Marlene and von Sternberg made a bafflingly congenial threesome.

AGAIN, for a time, Marlene was seen everywhere with Maurice Chevalier, who had just been divorced and was, supposedly, an eligible romantic. Yet Marlene still denied divorce rumors about herself. Hollywood was properly bewildered.

Then she did the most unexpected thing of all. She had been the one top-notch star who did not mind posing for leg art. Now, suddenly, she sheathed her famous legs, appearing everywhere in public in tailored trousered suits. A startled Press gave her a million dollars' worth of publicity. And she calmly denied that her trouser-wearing was a bit of shrewd showmanship.

"I never do anything to attract attention," she said, without once touching her tongue to her cheek. "I just happen to like the comfort of men's clothes. They are sensible. They never go out of style. They save time. And I like that, because I am lazy."

The spectacle of Hollywood's most feminine star preferring mannish clothes was the clinching proof that Marlene was an exotic.

In one respect, she made no compromise with her publicity. She brought her little girl over from Europe to be with her. She did not attempt to conceal the child, or her love for the child. They were inseparable. Marlene was patently proud of her motherhood.

That one exception to the general impression of Marlene's exoticism only made her the more baffling.

Then, last fall, Ernst Lubitsch, perhaps innocently, started the rumor and the suspicion that we were about to see a new Dietrich. A Dietrich less concerned with being exotic. A gayer, light-hearted Dietrich.

And events tended to confirm the rumor, the suspicion.

Marlene, in London, was going out to gay parties, and gay clubs, far more than she ever had in Hollywood. She was in the thick of the social whirl. And her constant escort was no sombre sophisticate, but a gay young man named Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.

In America, she had always avoided crowds, remaining a woman withdrawn. In London, she was constantly going places where police reserves had to be called, to control the mobs.

Then, an incident happened during the filming of "Knight Without Armor" in England that indicated an amazing good humor on Marlene's part. In a bathtub scene, she slipped, sprawling naked before the camera crew. They were unspeakably flustered. Not so Marlene. She laughed, picked herself up, climbed back in the tub, went on with the scene.

Then she returned to America, and one of the first things she did was to visit the Chief Naturalization Clerk in Los Angeles. All these years, America had had the impression that she was not particularly fond of America. Now, light-heartedly, she was declaring her intention of becoming an American, herself.

Soon afterward, for the first time within recent years, Hollywood was conscious of Marlene's going to parties, big, gay parties.

Then Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., arrived in town. And the London association continued in Hollywood. Once again, Marlene denied divorce rumors.

This time she said: "A woman approached me in London recently, asking what my husband could possibly mean to me when we were separated most of the time. I told her to consider the possibility that love might have something to do with it.

"I consider Mr. Sieber the perfect husband and father. After saying that, it's unnecessary to add that these persistent rumors are very, very wild."

Those who had doubted Marlene's interest in comedy, even Lubitsch comedy, saw her start "Angel," and saw her apparently enjoying it. They were able to see her because the "No Visitors" signs, once a fixture on Dietrich sets, had been taken down and put away. Apparently, the Dietrich temperament had been put away, too.

Hollywood remembered the von Sternberg days, the violent disagreements between star and director about how a scene should be filmed, the countless delays while they went over to the side of the set and argued the point in German.

Hollywood remembered, and marvelled at the change. For now Hollywood saw a good-humored star who went through a scene an indefinite number of times, docilely, until the director was satisfied.

I can vouch for this personally. I was there during most of the picture.

Marlene intimated, when the picture started, that she didn't want any interviews. She didn't say, however, that she wouldn't give one—if someone waited long enough for her to be in the mood. So I waited. Hopefully, at the beginning; patiently, at the middle; doggedly, near the end. She gave the interview between the next-to-last shot and the last.

Can this be romance? Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland, all dressed up and with plenty of places to go, you can bet. They don't only step out together, but they work together, too, their next picture being "Thoroughbreds Don't Cry."

THIS picture is probably in the lightest mood of any that Marlene has ever made. Yet in it, oddly enough, she is not a light woman. She plays the respected wife of a high British diplomat. As such, she has a new dignity, rather than a new light-heartedness. She is not an enchantress, but an enchanting woman. There is a difference.

As the diplomat's wife, she isn't supposed to be intentionally exotic. She has to be *un*intentionally so. But that doesn't mean that, between scenes, Marlene was joining the joking and laughter on the set, unconcerned with glamor. She was more concerned than ever before.

Constantly, between "takes," she was in front of a mirror, studying herself, looking in her own eyes, smiling at herself, touching up her make-up or her hair, making sure of the effect. Whether she deserved it or not, her incessant mirror-gaz-

How Constipation Causes Gas, Nerve Pressure

Many Doctors Now Say It's Nerves, Not Poisons That So Often Cause Headaches, Dizzy Spells, Coated Tongue

When you are constipated two things happen. FIRST: Wastes swell up the bowels and press on nerves in the digestive tract. This nerve pressure causes headaches, a dull, lazy feeling, bilious spells, loss of appetite and dizziness. SECOND: Partly digested food starts to decay forming GAS, bringing on sour stomach (acid indigestion), and heartburn, bloating you up until you sometimes gasp for breath.

Then you spend many miserable days. You can't eat. You can't sleep. Your stomach is sour. You feel tired out, grouchy and miserable.

To get the complete relief you seek you must do TWO things. 1. You must relieve the GAS. 2. You must clear the bowels and GET THAT PRESSURE OFF THE NERVES. As soon as offending wastes are washed out you feel marvelously refreshed, blues vanish, the world looks bright again.

There is only one product on the market that gives you the DOUBLE ACTION you need. It is ADLERIKA. This efficient carminative cathartic relieves that awful GAS almost at once. It often removes bowel congestion in half an hour. No waiting for overnight relief. Adlerika acts on the stomach and both bowels. Laxatives usually act on the lower bowel only.

ing gave her a new nickname on the set: Narcissus Dietrich.

The mirror-gazing was so habitual, by the end of the picture, that even while we were talking, Marlene watched herself in a mirror. I saw her profile, mostly a very alluring profile, but disconcerting, to talk to.

I asked her if there was any truth to the rumor that Marlene Dietrich had gone light-hearted.

Marlene patted a lock of hair, and smiled to herself. "Is there such a rumor?" she asked, in faint surprise.

I told her some of the grounds for the impression.

"So?" she asked, pursing her lips. "I do not think it is a rumor that will live long." She smiled. "I hope not, after these years of creating the opposite impression."

"You seriously mean that?"

She nodded. "Seriously, and frankly."

"The fact that you are making a comedy, and apparently enjoying it, indicates no new Dietrich?"

She patted another lock of hair. "I did not want to make a comedy, particularly."

"Don't you have story selection on your pictures?"

"Yes. But what I mean to say is, I wanted to do a picture with Lubitsch. He has genius. It merely happens that Lubitsch specializes in comedy."

She turned toward me, with a half-smile, and asked, "Why do people insist on thinking comedy is something new for me? I have made a comedy before. 'Desire,' have they forgotten, already?" She returned to mirror-gazing. "That was more comedy, really, than this is. That had no delicate problem of human relationships such as 'Angel' has."

"The fact that you have done two comedies isn't a symptom that you want to do more?"

"Two are enough," she said with smiling certainty. "If I did any more, people might actually think I crave comedy, and expect me to do it. I don't want that."

"What do you want?"

"Drama. I feel more at home in it. It is what Mr. von Sternberg trained me to do, and what I have trained myself to do. It is what I like best. And it is more memorable than comedy."

"Do you have any definite plans about your screen future?"

"My next picture will be my last on my present Paramount contract. I don't know yet what it will be, but it will be a drama. There is a rumor that, after that, I shall do three pictures for Mr. von Sternberg. The rumor is true. I don't know where they will be made. Perhaps here, perhaps in England. Wherever Mr. von Sternberg says. But that should dispose of all other rumors about what I am going to do on the screen for some time to come."

"On the screen, perhaps. But, off the screen, what of these rumors that you are going light-hearted? Were the English reporters all wrong? Isn't there anything to the impression of a new, party-going Dietrich?"

"Everyone is gay on vacation," she said, cryptically. "And I had an unexpected vacation in England. I had just finished a long, arduous picture, 'The Garden of Allah.' I had rushed over to England to start 'Knight Without Armor.' Robert Donat was ill. The starting date was postponed. I relaxed, for the first time in months. I went out, for the first time in months. London was a great temptation, it was so gay, but the things we like on vacation are not necessarily the things we do when we are working."

SHE took a cigarette, and as I lighted it, she continued: "It baffles me, this Hollywood impression that I am developing into a demon partygoer. Actually, I have lived a quieter life since my return this time than ever before. I have gone out less. The few times I have gone out, the photographers have happened to be there. People have seen my picture in the paper, attending two or three parties. That is the only explanation I can find."

In the mirror, she watched the glowing end of her cigarette, and commented, "It is amusing that anyone should get this party-going impression of me. One thing I like about Hollywood is the quiet life I can live here. There are no distractions. It is possible to sleep eight hours a night. It is possible to concentrate on work.

"I haven't changed, going to England, and returning, and making a comedy with Lubitsch. I'm afraid it would take more than that to change me, at this stage of my career."

I asked, "Do rumors about yourself affect you in any way today?"

"I ignore most of them. What good would it do me to be annoyed? That would not stop them. They are part of the game. You have to put up with them. They go on and on, as long as you are worth mentioning. The only rumor that really annoys me is the one that I encourage the rumors."

A smile appeared in the mirror.

"Mae West and I were in her dressing-room one time, laughing at the story in a newspaper that she and I were having a feud. I said, 'How did such a story ever start?' And Mae said, 'Some poor press-agent was stuck for a story. He had to get something in print to show his boss. So he invented this one. That's how many a story starts.'

"And I know it is so. The publicity department comes out to the set and says, 'Please give us a story, Miss Dietrich.' When I have legitimate news, like word of Mr. Sieber's coming, I give it to them. Usually, I have nothing. They go back empty-handed. To get my name in print, they seem to think it is necessary, they make up some little story.

"I don't understand why they take the trouble. The important thing is what people think of me on the screen. What they read about me in newspapers is not important."

"You sincerely believe that?"

"If I didn't, I might make up the little stories myself."

Remembering the debt that Marlene owed to publicity in her development as a star, I made a mental note: Here is one thing, at least, that Marlene seems to have gone light-hearted about. Publicity.

Light-heartedly, too, she told me her squelching answer to the newest divorce rumors. "My husband is arriving next week. I am going to Europe with him for a holiday, and putting Maria in a school in Switzerland."

"Are you following through on your intention of becoming an American citizen?"

"The future will decide. If my future is here, yes."

"How do you reconcile your tentative plans to become an American, and your sending your daughter to school in Switzerland?"

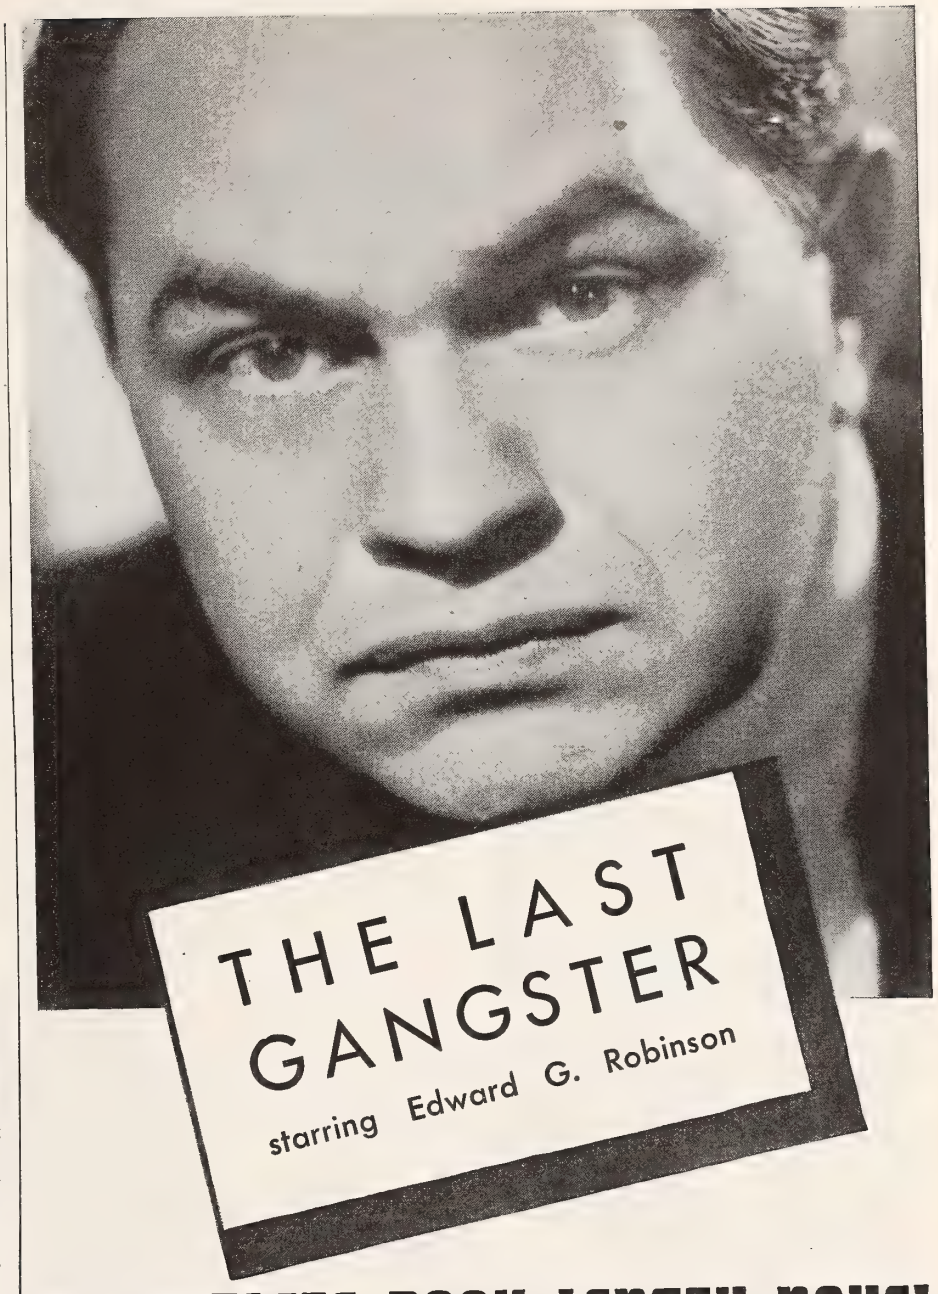
"It is a French school. I want her to learn French while she is still young. It will be much easier for her. And she is old enough now so that she will not forget how to speak English."

"You are sending her, even though it means separation?"

For a moment, her face was shadowed. For a moment, I glimpsed Marlene Dietrich, the mother, not the glamorous star. "Yes," she answered, almost inaudibly. "I must think of Maria. Not myself."

Just then, Lubitsch called Marlene back to the set.

Her last words to me had not been light-hearted. Far from it. All through the short interview, in fact, she had tried to perish the thought that the rumor of a new Dietrich might be true. Yet, as I watched the "take," the thought would not perish.



One word in the dialogue was difficult for her. She struggled, first, to pronounce it in flawless English. Then she struggled to give the same word the nuance of intonation that Lubitsch wanted. They went through the scene once, twice, five times. Then they tried it again.

And Marlene did not "blow up." She did not become impatient with the English language, Lubitsch or herself. She was blithe about it all.

The picture had been shooting for weeks. Here it was at the very end, and they couldn't seem to get this last scene on film. Everyone's nerves were fraying. Everyone's but Marlene's. In this moment when no one else was light-hearted, Marlene was smiling.

But if she is light-hearted, if she is a new Dietrich, she is not the one to reveal it. Or explain why.

I think she still believes what she used to believe. Keep Them Guessing.

from the beginning and he plays her like a fish!"

Even his current teaming with Claudette Colbert, in "Tovarich," cannot possibly stifle his craving for the prize part of the season. "They haven't even asked me to take a test for it," he admitted. "But I'm explaining to everyone—over the radio, too, whenever I have the chance—that I feel I could do a good job of it!"

Although it looks as though he must have been to his sweeping manner born, he originally had—he confesses honestly—neither a pittance of poise nor any punch. You can't be magnificently mellow until you have risen to that brave point where you take the world by the tail and swing people and circumstances into the niches you select. Basil had to study the trick. He wasn't a natural sophisticate.

Moreover, he hasn't had it easy. For months he's been after Rhett—but then he's always had to campaign deliberately for what he's wanted. "No plums have ever fallen into my lap," he said to me. And then, facilely switching from so dramatic a way of putting it into sheer simplicity, he was specifically astonishing.

He was born in Johannesburg, South Africa. His English parents had gone there because his mining engineer father thought that where there were diamonds there should be wealth. At the tender age of four, Basil, accompanied by a new brother and sister, settled with his parents back in a London suburb, He was duly sent to a private school.

"My childhood memory focuses around the cuckoo clock in my grandfather's home. I used to lie awake and listen to it make the lustiest row. I never had any doubts as to what I wished to become. I wanted to be an actor. That was an amazing, one might say, a ridiculous idea to my family. The Rathbones were solid old British stock. They were business folk, living quietly and comfortably as the backbone of the country should. They were well off. Rathbone Brothers of Liverpool dealt in cotton. They had shipping interests. Everyone hoped I'd behave myself.

"But I was determined to become an actor, somehow. I began to realize that there were, after all, a few Rathbones who weren't mentioned much. There was my uncle who was the sculptor and who had invested his income in a little factory where he turned out hand-made, hand-painted Della Robia pottery. There was another uncle who devoted himself to the making of superb tapestries, an appalling end for a legacy. My own father, I observed cautiously, had taken his inheritance and gone valiantly into business and to no avail. Father had a flair for writing and for the theatre, but he had suppressed himself. He was artistic through and through and he tackled the traditional business destiny with wretched results.

"I stumbled upon the fact that Grandfather Rathbone, who'd been a rich pillar of Liverpool, had dabbled in poetry on the side and had even had a volume of his poems published. Further, he entertained Henry Irving and Ellen Terry, the famous acting couple, in his home. He had distinguished himself as being the only man who'd ever gone to sleep while the silvery-voiced Henry Irving was speaking directly to him. A rocking-chair was too irresistible to him on that noted evening!

"And my grandfather on my mother's side—he'd had tuberculosis and retired to South Africa to die at a modest time of life. But there, he'd not only survived splendidly until he was a ripe seventy, but he blossomed as a new nation's foremost water-color painter. Whenever I was worried as to how I'd dare break over the traces I recalled these indisputable truths.

IN school I was perpetually dreaming of the theatre. I wrote scads of plays. They were wild melos. And of no earthly use so far as classes went. Finally I did shine brightly for one week. Instead of 'that boy' I was It momentarily. We had to write an essay on 'The Merchant of Venice' and that was a complete snap for me. I turned in a triumph entitled, 'Was Shylock the Hero of a Tragedy or the Villain of a Comedy?' My profundity was a sensation.

"My problem in school, you see, was a peculiar one. It was to be not too clever. I couldn't risk being promoted. The head of the form above mine had no sympathy with athletics and I had to see that I didn't know too much or I'd be promoted to him and then I'd never have fun. I was seventeen when I received that letter from my father saying there wouldn't be enough money for me to return in the fall. I was heartbroken, because that next year I would have won my colors in football and cricket and a pair of tall silver candlesticks if I'd won—as I think I could have—the half-mile in the track events."

He had to come home and show signs of becoming a respectable business man. "In England," mused Basil, "there are no little wise-crackers. You're still a child until you're out of your 'teens. 'What'll we do with him?' debated the family. I had an uncle who was president of an insurance company, so I was stuck in his London office to work up.

"How I solaced myself with the rebellious thought that somehow I'd escape such a dull fate! I licked stamps until my tongue felt like the bottom af a parrot's cage. It should be," he smiled, "a pleasure to send out office mail now that the personal touch isn't obligatory. I was promoted to the telephone board and nearly escaped then and there. The manager had no sense of humor. The name of the illustrious firm was The Liverpool, London and Globe Insurance Company. I got the London out first in a few instances. The manager was horrified.

"'My good young man,' he informed me, 'although your family has an important place in this business, you have made a grave error several times. It must be stopped.'

"I did all my 'learning' during my luncheon hour, in a vacant office I'd discovered on the floor above. There I was hidden away and I could 'practice' without interruption. I learned, and precisely what it was going to get me I didn't know, some sixty long poems, ranging from Browning and Shelley through Byron. I taught myself a repertoire of Shakespeare. Not that I had nerve enough to let a soul in on these secret lessons!

"I'm remembering the stunt my brother pulled on the staid business men of London! Every morning I came into the city, arriving at Victoria Station with thousands of other men who timed themselves by glancing up Victoria Street to the huge clock on Westminster Abbey. That gesture reassured you as you hurried to your bus.

It so happened one morning that everyone was frantically late, an entire hour late. There was a panting rush to offices. And all because late the night before my brother and another lad, students at Westminster School, had the inspiration of inspirations. They'd crawled perilously along balustrades and climbed up ledges and advanced the hand of that clock!

"One morning I decided to challenge the Gods. I resigned. I knew that within another year or so they intended to make me a branch manager at $2500. a year. But I'd sat at a desk and added forty or fifty pages of figures, hunting for an elusive ha'pence, and I'd kept promising myself that I'd get out of there before I was sunk. I went from the office straight to see Sir Frank Benson, a cousin who had perhaps England's most extraordinary theatrical company. He trouped in Shakespeare and had three different units. Beginners often paid to learn acting from him.

"When he asked me what I could do I stood up and went through one of Shylock's main scenes, giving a pertinent voice to each character, and presenting the whole thing with gusto. I couldn't do as well now, I'm afraid. But then, at last before someone of the theatre, I hadn't a trace of fear; I knew I was good. He asked if my father would consent to my trying to act and I lied furiously; I knew father couldn't stop me. Sir Frank was always afraid I'd coast because I was a relative, so invariably he made things harder for me.

"'Certain men can look at horseflesh and say "I believe this is going to be a winner," he stated solemnly when I'd finished my stunt. 'I think you ought to make an interesting actor. But it's up to you. I'll put you in the Number Two company and you can do two roles a night and there'll be ten plays in the repertoire. Your salary will be one pound a week.'

YES, my parents were worried," Basil confessed. "I was only nineteen, they'd gotten me a job with a sound future. Actor? I was plunging into an uncharted field. Into something where there was no guarantee. Besides, at nineteen everyone presumes he can act. I knew I would succeed, but no one else knew it. Everyone warned me of my foolishness, but I had that stupendous confidence of youth."

For fifteen months he toured, ecstatically doing bits, living on his $4.85 a week. "I was so one-track that it would really have been difficult for me to have failed." Basil, who is so cosmopolitan, so enthusiastic on every subject, a one-track mind?

"I wanted to get away from people, to live in a dream world of my own and shut out reality. I dreaded frankness and friendships. Fortunately that was the peak of the English theatre then. The theatre was glamorous beyond words. All the great actors had their own theatres and starred in them for years. You became tops and you stayed in your nice shell. Now an actor isn't sure of his reputation beyond his last play or picture! I didn't have to come out of my dreams. I didn't have to be practical, as I do now. I viewed everything in terms of the theatre. When I had the flu I contentedly read more plays. I couldn't discuss anything else but backstage; I never spoke except about theatrical technique."

So no wonder he was promoted to Benson's Number One company. At twenty he was touring the United States in Shakespeare, enacting second leads and earning $35. a week. "I managed to save out of that, too. Although I can't forget El Paso because we crossed the border to look at Juarez and we met a gentleman who showed us the bull-ring and led us into gambling away most of our savings!

"We economized by four of us young fellows taking one hotel room with two double beds. We ate at cafeterias and it was such fun gazing at all the food in sight before choosing what would be most filling." Basil, whose dinner parties are events in Hollywood, grinned like a college lad.

The troupe moved from city to city in two cars of its own. "Two day coaches in which we economically sat up nights. We'd buy cans of Sterno and take turns cooking our meals whenever we were on a train."

MRS. BASIL RATHBONE is the former Ouida Bergere, talented scenario writer, who abandoned her career when they married. But Basil, the ideal husband in Hollywood apparently, was married once before. He wasn't quite so one-track as he described himself, for the girl who played opposite him was evidently too attractive to be ignored. He hasn't wholly altered; at least he could be impetuous then.

He was twenty-one and he'd made no acquaintances outside of the troupe. But what did that matter? A lot of marrying was going on in the company. It was spring and he had a sweetheart! As soon as the American tour was over there was a London ceremony and two were to be one forever after. They honeymooned at Stratford-On-Avon, acting Shakespeare at the famed summer festival.

But two months after, the World War burst upon them. For four years Basil was away at the Front. He won, I have found out elsewhere, a lieutenancy and a military cross. He can cut with a mere word, on the screen; in person he doesn't boast.

The cool cynicism he can display belies his real self. Actually, he is an absolute romantic. He has a command to his vigor, and yet love to him must be spiritual, or it isn't the real thing.

There were hasty trips to a small London apartment, week-ends when he got away from the cannons of the war. Gradually, though, there just was no more bloom to that union.

"When I was demobilized life suddenly had no purpose," he said. "I was so young that the War, in spite of its horrors, had been a tremendous adventure. But no destroyers escorted us back across the channel. We'd felt used to them, as though they were for our very own benefit. The camp looked shoddy; officers no longer meant anything at all. And London—! I found my mother dead, that my brother had been killed in the fighting. There was no money left. Nor," he added softly, "was there anything left to what I'd imagined was the passion of my life.

"The theatre? Make-up and rehearsals seemed so blah right then. Yet I had to work and all I knew was the Benson companies. I heard the Stratford festival was being reorganized. I went after a part."

Constance Collier, who starred in "Peter Ibbetson" on Broadway, saw him. She was seeking a leading man for her London production, someone who could equal John Barrymore's interpretation in America. She saw Basil and knew he was the one. And, at twenty-five, unfamiliar to the critical audiences of London, he was an overnight hit.

"That first night," he exclaimed, "will never leave me. All the fine men of the theatre, the actors whom I'd worshipped from a distance, were there. And they walked up on the stage to congratulate me! Forbes Robertson, whose 'Hamlet' I'd seen four times. Sir John Hare and all the rest!"

STILL, it wasn't success that finally brought him out of his shell. "I never went out socially after that night. I was as solitary as ever. Eventually, when people insisted that I mix I did try it. But everything I did was wrong when I attempted to be a gay fellow. I was a little too exuberant. I laughed and joked too noisily. I was putting on an act. Of course, I really had no consideration for the viewpoint of others. I wasn't interested in the world in general. Expanding was a sad debacle!"

So it was until Ouida came along. He went from one stage success to another, but his inner life was unfulfilled until he met her. He was starring on Broadway. She was giving one of her gala parties and he was inveigled into attending. She was giving one of her gala week-ends at her country home soon after and he didn't have to be asked twice. After that week-end he knew he was in love.

For three years he courted her. They had a most romantic wedding in a Park Avenue apartment. A candle-lit, flower-decked altar where they took vows that have proved far more than idle protestations.

"If I've changed," said Basil, offering me a cocktail and a cigarette, "and learned how to enjoy people and places and everything that goes on about us today, it's because of Ouida. She is so vital, so sophisticated in every sense of the word, that I couldn't lag behind. I have some pride, you know! Her appreciation of fine music, of the theatre, of art was one of our first bonds. But it is her relish for exacting the most from every waking moment that enchants me, I suppose."

With Ouida beside him he has become a foremost Hollywood figure, personally and professionally.

"I don't want romantic leads, as some interviewers have persistently reported. I want variety. I don't mind being a bad man in pictures, although I do object to having to be a bloodless, inhuman sort. I believe"—and he cocked an eyebrow at me—"that I could play Rhett Butler as he ought to be played. From here." His index finger retouched his black, black hair. "I rather know how he became the man he is. He learned that you have to come out of your dreams to get ahead in this practical, modern age. He clung secretly to his romantic ideals. You see, he—"

But we were right where we'd started. Love has made Basil Rathbone a happy, buoyant battler.

tender age, a combination of an embryo Rockefeller and a Caruso, he rode his bike instead of the trolley, saved his car tickets, cashed them in and thus added to his savings. Every cent he made, except what was absolutely necessary for shoes and shirts, he deposited himself in the People's Dime and Savings Bank. He told me, "I gloated over that little book like a hoarding miser or a Praying Mantis. I became a good mathematician so there could be no way of chiseling me out of a copper."

THE summer he was fifteen he got a job as chauffeur to a wealthy Scranton widow. His employer had been cook to a very wealthy man who had married her, died and left her his fortune. And with the crop of petty cruelties and snobberies indigenous to such soil, the lady belabored the lad at the wheel. He bore it as long as he could for the sake of the twenty dollars a week there was in it.

The following summer he went to Asbury Park. He sang at the Belmar Church for twenty dollars the Sunday. He got a job at Freihofer's Bakery, working from ten p. m. to six a. m. He said, "I was a helper to a giant buck Negro. One night he and I got into a terrific fight. We were both fired. I didn't mind so much because, though I'd lost a job, I had proved my strength. I didn't get too much the worst of it. I believed then what I believe now, that a good physique and singing should go together. And they do, nowadays. Nelson Eddy, Lawrence Tibbett, John Boles, Richard Bonelli, all of them are fine figures of men.

After the fight with the negro, Allan got a job driving a laundry truck. He delivered hampers of wet wash to walk-up hotels. Walk-up hotels have many and steep flights. And have you ever toted wet wash?

He got a job chauffeuring for a wealthy family from New York. They became good friends, Allan and his employers.

And he met, in Asbury, his first romance. One of those early, youthful romances it was, with the moon, the sea, the stars, the nostalgic weight of young dreams acting as agencies for Cupid.

"I'd never had time to go around with girls at home," Allan told me, "much as I would have liked to. In all the years in Scranton I never had one 'steady' girl friend, no romances, not even a friendship with a girl worth the mentioning. I had neither the time, the money, nor the clothes. Occasionally I'd ask some girl to go to a movie with me, have a soda at the drugstore afterwards. That was the full extent of my social life, my dissipations."

A good, folksy home life, the background of young Don Diego Jones. His memories are of the bread that Mother used to bake, fresh vegetables from their own garden, pickling and jam-making and grace at table, his Welsh grandmother who told him tales of his Welsh forebears. Strong, plain food, the Golden Rule, an honest wage honestly earned, this was the "easy does it" of Hollywood's rising star.

At the end of his summer in Asbury he went back to high school. He played two weeks of football, first chance he'd had, and broke his right wrist. He kept on making money. He had the bleacher concession and made a good thing of it. He managed the cafeteria in high school. Came summer again and he worked with the steel girder gang in the mines. One day he took a bad spill from a soaring girder and smashed the wrist already broken once, splintering the bone to powder. The bone was removed and a silver plate inserted. Now, Allan can't bend that wrist backwards. And on damp days it causes him some pain.

WHEN he was a senior in high he got a job driving coal trucks. He worked for a man who amassed a quarter of a million during the coal strike by collecting waste materials, processing them, selling them. The man on the shovel, a mature Hercules, earning seventy-five dollars a week, broke his leg. Allan asked for the job and got it. He was eighteen. By the end of the first week he was loading twenty-one cars of sixty tons each. At the end of three months the strike ended and the job with it. But that seventy-five dollars a week had substantially augmented the little pile in the Dime Bank. Easy did it.

Allan went into the mines of which his father was foreman. He got fifty-eight cents an hour and, to increase the ante, worked double shift, sixteen hours a day. The gang of nine men under him, Poles and Italians, were tough customers. It was occasionally necessary to knock some ambition into their hot heads. And not by words.

When Allan was eighteen he had fifteen hundred dollars put away. Fifteen hundred dollars which represented the years of his boyhood. He had, too, sufficient credits to enter Syracuse. And so, one day, he packed his two suits, pants presser, shirts, collars, socks, parental blessings and his ambition in the family rucksack and took off on the first lap of his journey to Hollywood. He remained at Syracuse for three months. Then came a wire from New York. It was from LeRoy Eltringham, formerly curate of St. Luke's in Scranton. The man who had, from the start, taken a warm interest in the sturdy, self-reliant boy. The wire said, "Come to New York right away. This is the place for you."

Allan went to New York. LeRoy Eltringham took him the rounds of the city's finest voice teachers. Three of them, apprised of the fact that funds were scanty, regretted that they could do nothing for him. The fourth, Claude Warford, heard him sing "The Valley" from "The Messiah" and offered to give him three lessons a week, free. Through the further offices of Mr. Eltringham he got a scholarship at N. Y. U. in exchange for singing in the Glee Club. He was soloist with a quartette in the Washington Heights Presbyterian Church. When he found that he couldn't do justice to the college curriculum and his voice lessons, too, he was made a special student, taking only languages, French, German, Italian.

In the summer, Claude Warford took such pupils as could afford it to his summer school in Paris. Allan couldn't afford it. But he had to go. He sat down and wrote to his Dad. He asked what about the possibilities of giving an Allan Jones concert in Scranton? Daniel Jones wrote back, "I have two thousand men working for me, son. They'll buy tickets, or else."

From that one concert Allan netted eleven hundred dollars. He sailed for Europe with Mr. Warford and his fellow students.

Allan studied in Paris. He coached with Reynaldo Hahn, famous French conductor and composer at the Opera Mise en Scene, with Felix Le Roux of the National Opera of Paris. In the fall he returned to New York and to his first big professional engagement, as soloist with Anna Case with the New York Philharmonic. For two succeeding summers he commuted to Paris. He studied oratorio in London with Sir Henry Wood. He sang at Deauville. He would return to America and do concerts all over the country, at one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars the concert He did radio shorts.

In 1929 came the crash. In more ways than one. Allan's good friend, LeRoy Eltringham, dropped dead of a heart attack. Allan lost most of his hard-earned money. Concert business was bad. And he did a little near-starving for months. He said, "Well, borrowing money anyway. That's a kind of hunger that's also shame and worse than body hunger." Then Charlie Wagner put on "Boccaccio," formerly sung by Jeritza at the Met. Allan's salary was five hundred dollars a week. It was an artistic triumph but a commercial failure.

Allan signed with the Shuberts. He played in St. Louis, a new show every week. "The Student Prince," "Floradora," "Sari," the repertoire of light opera. He barnstormed. He did one-night stands.

At the end of the third year Allan opened in "Annina" with Jeritza. He also played the name part in "The Life of Stephen Foster." And it was while he was singing in "Annina" that the mills of the gods speeded up their grinding. For Bill Grady and one or two other officials of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio heard him and saw him. Arthur Lyons was Allan's agent. There was a get-together and a test. Louis B. Mayer wired from Hollywood. "Sign Jones to long-term contract immediately." Allan signed. There was a rider to the contract. He had, first, to get free of his Shubert contract, with two years to go. There were threats of blackball. There was considerable mental anguish for Allan and, in the end, it cost him twenty thousand dollars to be free for the movies.

He arrived in Hollywood at seven-thirty one morning. No flags were raised. At ten a. m. he was on the set, met Jean Harlow and sang his song for "Reckless." "What a swell kid she was," Allan said. "She was the first one in Hollywood to give me the glad hand, wish me well, prophesy that I'd go places. I'd give more than an awful lot if she could have been at the premiere of 'Firefly.'

"Well, then, I made 'Night At The Opera' with the merry Marxes, 'Showboat' for Universal, did a bit, a song, in 'Rose Marie.' And the sound track for 'A Pretty Girl Is Like A Melody' in 'The Great Ziegfeld.' Hunt Stromberg had asked me to do that for him, that and the song in 'Rose Marie.' He told me that if I'd be a good sport and help him out he would eventually find a role for me that would put me on the centre of the movie map. I tried not to expect too much. You learn, in show business, that illusions wear pretty thin, promises are cheap coins, easily spent.

"But Stromberg didn't forget. He more than made good his promise. I couldn't have failed in 'Firefly' if I tried. Not with Stromberg producing, Leonard directing and Jeanette singing. Jeanette singing, it would be the ambition of any male singer to appear opposite her. And believe me, ma'am, it was sure mine! And when you consider how my role might have been subordinated to hers you can guess how much I really owe her. She gave me every break, and then some. The songs were equally divided between us. If anything, I got the better of the division with the 'Donkey's Serenade' and the 'Giannina Mia.' Hear about the wire she sent me the night of the premiere? It just said, 'Congratulations on YOUR big night.' Jeanette and Gene and Irene and I had been close friends long before we did 'Firefly.' I thought she was swell then. But there had been no test of friendship at that time. Now there has been and I know how swell she is."

I FIRST saw Irene," Don Diego Jones told me then, his cold gray eyes warm, "when she was playing the lead in 'Ladies' Money,' a studio play given at the Hollywood Music Box. I went to the play with Betty Furness. I kept watching Irene. I asked about her. Betty laughed and said, 'Better not waste time thinking about her, my friend, her time is all taken up!' I said, 'Oh, yeah, Bob Taylor.' I remembered I'd heard they were going together. Later I learned that Irene had seen me in 'Night At The Opera' and had asked about me.

"One day I was walking down the lot right in back of her. She didn't see me. She was humming 'Alone,' my song in 'Night At The Opera.' I passed her and looked back. We both laughed. I knew that I was in love with her then. But there were obstacles. Among them, Irene was going with Bob.

"We kept on meeting at parties. Betty Furness gave one that Christmas. Irene was there with Bob. Then there was a party at Arthur Lyons'. Again Irene was with Bob. She sat between us and I managed to monopolize her attention for an hour. So much was gained." (Easy didn't exactly do it, even in love. Imagine falling in love with the girl who was going with Robert Taylor!)

"Then Raoul Walsh gave a party. Bob was out of town. Irene came with Cesar Romero. I took Betty. Betty is a wise girl. She saw the way things were going. She asked me how I'd like to take Irene home instead of her. I didn't need to answer that. And Betty, laughing, went to Cesar and said, 'Say, Butch, they've changed the script on us, you are taking me home.'

"Yep, from my first sight of her I knew that it had to be. We were like magnets, one to the other. And if we don't live happily ever after it won't be through any conscious fault of mine. When, all obstacles ironed out, we were married on July 26th, 1936, and I said 'I do,' I meant it with all my heart. We're so happy, in every way, that I should get out the old rabbit's foot and look at the moon over my right shoulder. Everything seems to be easy doing it, now. Dad and my mother were out here this summer. They got a big kick out of watching me work in 'Firefly.' Jeanette invited them to her wedding and, boy, they have enough to tell the home folks to keep 'em going until our Golden Wedding! Dad feels that the career he never had has come true in me. "I'm crazy about Irene's little girl. And soon we'll be crazy again about one of our own. I'm not sure what I'll do next on the screen. It may be 'The Red Mill' with Della Lind, the Viennese singing find. I can leave all that to Hunt. He gave me my illusions back, not a tatter in 'em.

"I'm happy," said Allan, his earnestness good to see. "It's been hard work but I'd do it all over again, work treble shift for the gifts the gods have given me."

What, No Love Interest?

Can you imagine? It wasn't until three complete hours had elapsed since I had seen the picture, that the whole truth really dawned on me. Yes, I'm talking about little Deanna Durbin's triumph. I saw "One Hundred Men and a Girl," came home, raved about it, and suddenly realized that the picture had managed to escape without something that almost every picture is lost without. There was no love interest! Deanna was, thank Heavens, not a cute little go-between for a couple of idiots madly in love; in fact, far from being the go-between for anybody, I should say that she was the "go." Let's have more pictures of this calibre, and especially, let's have more of Deanna.—Thelma Greenberg, Washington, D. C.

Pent-up Indignation

This is written especially in reply to a certain Texas lassie who bent over backwards to say insulting things about Barbara Stanwyck in your August issue. We're all entitled to our favorites, but when I resort to airing my feelings on the printed page, I sincerely hope I have intelligence enough not to confuse constructive criticism with "just being plain catty."

Of course, there are those who never see good in anyone and to them perhaps the forthright honesty and loyalty that are reflected in those lovely eyes of Miss Stanwyck's go to make her face appear "plain." But to those of us who can appreciate sincerity in all its worthiness and know Barbara for the grand person she is, these things make her beautiful in reality rather than a glamor-coated actress.

I'm willing to wager that all the anti-Stanwyck grumblers are ardent Bob Taylor fans and therein lies the answer to these jealous accusations. What do you think?—Betty June Simpson, Calumet City, Ill.

ROBERT TAYLOR'S KING!

Letters and more letters have been pouring in from all parts of the country and from outside the country, too—all trying to settle the question, which we raised some months ago. Who Is King of Feminine Hearts—Robert Taylor or Tyrone Power? Now, at last, the votes have been counted and although Bob leads with 14,567 votes, Ty follows neck-and-neck with 14,359. So, girls and boys, Bob Taylor's King. Long Live the King!

Followers-up in the contest are Clark Gable, Errol Flynn and Nelson Eddy, but every masculine player in Hollywood, from the romantic leads to character actors, seems to have plenty of girls' hearts tucked away in his pocket.

And now, ask our men readers, how about giving the boys a chance to crown a Queen? It's all right with us, so cast your votes and let's settle the matter. Who Is Queen of Masculine Hearts?

Barbara would Write instead of Read.
And if—
Nelson were a Ripple, not an Eddy,
Fred were a Hall, not Astaire,
Martha were a Beam, not a Raye,
Clark were the Roof, not the Gable
Shirley were a Church, not a Temple,

Personality—Better Than Beauty

Harry. But do admit the truth to yourself and go after what you want with all your might and main.

THERE is, naturally, a heck of a sight more than honesty with oneself required in the development of charm and distinction—in other words, personality. Next to the ability to be on the level with yourself, I'd say, comes the conquering of fear, self-consciousness, shyness. Then, perhaps, comes the courage to be a little different from the herd. All bound around with these steps in becoming a real person, there must be the ability to use one's judgment—a sense of discrimination which will tell you when, let us say, to dare a slightly mad make-up, hair-do or hat and when not to; when to come out loudly with all the courage of your convictions, and when to keep mum and let the other feller do the talking. Also bound around with this personality development is the desirability of being the best-looking individual, physically, that you can possibly manage to be.

A large order, you say? I'm having a swell time using words and saying nothing? Personality is something you're born with and can't develop, you think? You're wrong! Listen:

About overcoming self-consciousness, now . . . here's something to bolster your ego with. If you feel that you don't look so hot, consider some of the famous women you read about in the papers. Women in public life, society women, writers, successful business women. Are they always good-looking? No. Often they're exactly the opposite and some of 'em can't even wear their expensive clothes well. Yet they've gone places, made money, annexed doting husbands, and made people like them. All by using their brains and the force of their personalities. If this personality-success can come to unattractive women, it can certainly come to those of you who are reasonably blessed by nature with physical loveliness and those of you who can acquire physical loveliness by a decent amount of attention to diet, exercise and simple beauty routines.

Another way of overcoming self-consciousness: have a dress-rehearsal before you go out into sassiety. Never try anything new on the public. Try it on the dog first. Try it on your family, your girl friend, your husband. By that I mean, don't attempt any innovation in make-up (particularly) or coiffure just before a date or a party. Sure as fate, something will go haywire and when you're out with all the folks you'll wish to heaven you had stuck to the good old part in the middle, or left off the purple eyeshadow. That will make you think about yourself, you see, and one of the first rules for personality-success is forgetting yourself and thinking about the other guy.

Be pretty sure of a new dress before you go out, especially if it's a not-too-expensive dress. Try it on a couple of times in the bright, cruel light of day. Look at the seams and the finishings. It may look pretty nice when you stand up, straight as a die, holding your stomach in and your rear flat. But how does it look when you sit? How does it look when you walk? If it's cut bias anywhere, it may shorten embarrassingly when you sit down. Better see about that. Does the slip show, or stop short too far above the hem?

That hat, now. How does it look from the back? What does it do to your hair when you take it off? Take pains—take time—be a little slow and fuss-budgetty with details of your personal appearance. You had better wear the old black dress, which people always admire, than be in too much of a hurry to shine in the red number bought this very afternoon at the sale.

IF you're reasonably sure and satisfied about your personal appearance, you've won half the battle in overcoming self-consciousness. For the rest, recall what I said above: forget yourself and think about the other person. Listen. Ask questions. Smile. Laugh. Be interested. (If you follow that rule with men, you're practically set.) Don't be flustered by little embarrassments that come up. Take them coolly and matter-of-factly. With men, reserve a little of yourself: speak quietly and slowly, give the impression that you could say more than you do.

All these tips are good if you're not particularly sure of yourself. As you gain poise and assurance, come out a little more strongly with your opinions and convictions. Perhaps—who knows?—you have the gift to make people laugh. There's a stupid old belief that men don't admire a sense of humor in a girl. Never was a sillier word spoken. Why, look at Barbara Stanwyck! There are many better looking gals in Hollywood, aren't there? But about fifty per cent of Barbara's popularity is due to the fact that she possesses our first requisite for personality: honesty with herself—and everybody else, too. And the other fifty per cent, almost, can be put down to a quick, dry sense of humor. Robert Taylor is never bored with Barbara—and that's one of the chief reasons he sticks around.

However, to get back to overcoming self-consciousness, find out what is the correct thing to do in all social situations. Don't be a slave to these rules and regulations, but know about 'em just the same. They're a great help. Have a little social patter on the tip of your tongue. It will come in handy when you can't think of a bloomin' thing to say. And, of course, I don't need to tell you that the more you read—books, magazines, newspapers—the better off you'll be. Learn to play a couple or more of the socially popular games, even if you hate games. If you're not naturally a good dancer, see if you can't take some dancing lessons. And if you're at a girls' school or college, please, please don't fall into the insidious habit of dancing with other gals. I did this, much to my sorrow. During the lunch hour or after dinner, on would go the croaky old victrola and, being tall, M. M. did a powerful lot of leading. It's terrible. Don't you ever do it, if you never dance a step.

Have you a talent, hidden or otherwise? I wanta say a thing or two about talents. These days, I think, one must be pretty good before one gets up to entertain the company. There's so much good stuff to listen to and look at nowadays—on the radio, at the theatres. By all means, if you can play or sing or dance, work at your talent and be ready to please and amuse folks with your efforts, for this gift will buy you more popularity than big blue eyes or naturally blonde hair. But don't do things sloppily and half way.

When I went to see the latest "Broadway Melody," my main urge was for the sight of Eleanor Powell's dancing feet. But the hit of the show to me—good though Miss P. was—turned out to be little Judy Garland. Why? Goodness knows, I've heard enough of that general type of hot singing. But young Judy did it so well—she put so much umph behind her songs. Her young voice is powerful and sure of pitch. It's not a little pipe-squeak of a voice, blown up by the sound man into something which it isn't. It's as natural as Judy herself, with her snapping black eyes and her wide mouth, which isn't a bit pretty, but which intrigues you and makes you like her, just because it isn't reshaped with lipstick.

FRANCES FARMER, now, is the best looking girl of the four at the beginning of this article, if you're talking about classic features and such. But why is Frances going places, while other pretty blondes are left behind? In the first place, pretty blondes are apt to be insipid, and that's one thing Miss Farmer isn't. In the second place, Frances doesn't make the mistake of so many pretty blondes of being frilly and fussy, with great gobs of the pretty hair falling to the shoulders and all over the face. It's a great temptation to "show off" lovely yellow hair, but it's much smarter to wear it close.

Another "different" charm about Frances Farmer: her voice and manner. She's completely natural, and her manner is matter-of-fact and hail-fellow-well-met, without being in the least horsey or tough. Blondes are so apt to be (1) statuesque and unapproachable or (2) too demure and fluttery.

While I'm on the subject of being different, let me say just two more things: good-looking blondes, redheads and brunettes, the striking types, in other words, will do well to soften their vivid quality on most occasions. By that, I mean, wear simple coiffures, only such make-up as you need to look your best, and simple, dark or neutral toned clothes. On most occasions, I say. Why? So that, dears, you may shine all the more brightly in a gay gown or a sophisticated hair-do on rare occasions and so, too, that you won't tire all that must look at you every day in the week.

The other thing I want to say about being different is this: when you don't seem to be getting much of anywhere with your present appearance and present method of attack upon the world at large, try some radical change in appearance and manner. This will take a bit of courage.

But, what have you got to lose? You're not happy the way things are. If you've never worn red, and think you can't wear red, perhaps it would be a swell idea to buy the reddest dress you can find. Bob your hair, if it's long. Buy a switch if it's short. I knew a mousey little person once who had no claim to beauty particularly, but someone persuaded her to try some mascara. Lo and behold, though her lashes were so light that they barely showed without the make-up, they were long and silky and a touch of the old reliable goo made her eyes lovely.

I THINK American girls and women are getting better looking every day and yet most of them still lack something. I took a motor trip recently and went through some of the pokiest little towns, far away from the big cities, and yet, so many of the girls in these towns looked chic and smart. They all knew a few tricks of make-up and hair arrangement. Nice figures, and pretty faces and eyes chockful of allure. Yet, there is that "something" which almost every American girl lacks, whether she lives in a small town or a big city—an illusive quality which even the plainest foreign girl and woman seems to possess. Take Luise Rainer, who certainly isn't plain—not with those eyes—but who is certainly not as physically luscious as many a cutie in Hollywood or on Main Street. Now what the heck is it?

I think it's the summation of all the things I've been trying to tell you about in this article. Honesty with oneself. No self-consciousness, because when one knows how to act and what to do and how to make the best of one's features, hair and figure, there's no earthly reason to be self-conscious. Courage to be yourself and do, wear and say what you please, instead of imitating the girl next door.

The sophisticated European woman, too, has an instinctive knowledge of how to charm and please men which many of us must learn by bitter experience. But you can learn it, and you gotta learn it, if you want to be really happy, and there's plenty of competition these days, too. When to flatter a man, when to pique him with indifference; when to turn on a little heat, when to keep the brute in a cool, dry place; when to be all feminine and soft and when to be a modern frank pal; when to intrigue him by intelligent interest in the things he's interested in, when to be a little dumb, in a helpless, pretty sort of way.

Well, I hope I haven't got you all beautifully bawled up. Maybe I should have stuck to the good old one-two-three about taking care of your fingernails, faces and hair. But I had this on my chest and had to get it off.

HERE'S a good exercise to flatten the tum and slim the waist. Stand with feet ten inches apart, toes turned slightly in. Hands on hips, and if you dig and squeeze with those hands while you're doing the exercise, it won't hurt a particle. Now bend back, very slowly, as far as you can go without losing your balance. Come forward by describing a circle with your upper body—first to the left. Way forward. Now back to an upright position again. Repeat, describing your circle this time to the right. Feel your stomach muscles pull when you bend back. Do that for twenty minutes every morning—or as long a time as you can spare—and see how charmingly flat in front you become by next month.

If your face is feeling a little dry these snappy days, try this change in your make-up routine for a while. Buy yourself some good foundation cream, in a tone a smitch darker than your skin. Pay a decent price for it. There are a number on the market, costing about a buck and a half per throw, but they last forever. Use this cream, and your lipstick and whatever, and no powder. A lot of the Hollywood beauties do this, to refresh their skins after the heavy picture make-up.

Also, I gotta present for yuh. Fill in coupon below, plizz, and receive sample. It's a skin cleaner that does wonders for the smoothness of the pelt. You mix it up yourself with warm water to a creamy consistency and apply it to your face and remove it with a wash cloth wrung out of warm water. It's completely non-alkaline in action and especially if your skin is roughened and dry, it will do wonders for it. See if I'm not right—and remember, a good skin never hurt any personality!

★★ Ebb Tide

This is the first sea picture for which Technicolor has been used, and on that account alone is worth seeing. The photographic effects are good throughout, and in some scenes have exceptional beauty—in particular a storm at sea and some South Sea Island shots.

The story is taken from the familiar one by Robert Louis Stevenson and concerns the adventures of three men who have brought disgrace upon themselves in one way or another, and are now adrift in the world. The men are an old-sea-captain (Oscar Homolka), a repulsive cockney derelict (Barry Fitzgerald), and a young and cultured Englishman (Ray Milland). The captain gets a chance at last to take a ship to Australia, and gets berths for his two cronies. At sea they decide to chart their course for Peru instead, sell the cargo, and start life anew. In the midst of their plottings, the former captain's daughter (Frances Farmer) suddenly appears out of hiding, and demands that justice be upheld—emphasizing her statement by shooting the captain. Excitement rides high on the voyage, between typhoons, drunken sprees of the captain and steward when the ship drifts aimlessly, and the fear of starvation when the supplies run out. The climax comes with the discovery of an island on which is a fabulous fortune in pearls, but it is controlled by the ruthless Lloyd Nolan, who sets about murdering the men so he can have Frances for his very own.

It's a good story, but gets off to a painfully slow start—even the most exciting episodes becoming monotonous through being too long-drawn-out. As we said before, you'll want to see it for the photography, but it could have been much more thrilling, had more attention been paid to the development of the story.

First prize for acting goes to Barry Fitzgerald, without whom the film would have fallen completely flat. Oscar Homolka's slow, heavy actions are well suited to his role, in this one, while Ray Milland and Frances Farmer are no more than adequate. Directed by James Hogan.—Paramount.

★★ Fight for Your Lady

This is Jack Oakie's picture, from first to last. So if an hour of Grade A Oakie antics suits your mood, you won't go wrong on it. The story centers around the ridiculous situation of John Boles being jilted, the first time such a thing has happened to the handsome Mr. B., at least on the screen.

He turns to demon rum and Jack Oakie for consolation, and with such a combination there's small wonder that he comes out of the predicament a better and wiser man.

In Budapest he falls madly in love with a cabaret entertainer, Ida Lupino, and this would all be very nice, except for the fact that Ida has an aristocratic suitor, Eric Blore, who has the nasty habit of killing off her extra boy friends by means of the time-honored duelling system. Eric has one other weakness besides Ida, however, he's a push-over for mothers. This gives rise to one of the really hilarious incidents of the picture.

The climax comes when, just as he is about to stab Mr. Boles through the heart, our hero's poor old widowed mother shows up on the scene and begs for her boy's life. As the poor old widowed mother, Jack Oakie never looked better! Though Oakie outshines everyone, creditable performances are given by the rest of the cast, in particular Eric Blore and Margot Grahame. Miss Lupino and Mr. Boles are adequate in the leads. Directed by Ben Stoloff.—RKO.

★ The Bride Wore Red

Wouldn't it be swell if somebody got a new story for Joan Crawford? Or perhaps Miss Crawford likes the one she's been using for all these years. She should be advised, however, that it's getting a bit shabby around the edges. All of which means that "The Bride Wore Red" is a dull and routine picture which will disappoint the Crawford fans and bore the rest of the audience.

Briefly, the story has Joan as a singer in a low waterfront dive who gets a momentary fling at wealth and fine clothes only to discover that what she really wants is happiness, which, as all movie-goers know, is enjoyed only by the poor.

Miss Crawford's wooden portrayal of the girl slows the film up considerably. Several of the supporting players turn in excellent jobs, but because so much of the footage is given to the star, their scenes are much too brief. Franchot Tone, in the role of a village postmaster, lends warmth and reality to his part, and Robert Young, as a slightly decadent young millionaire, is smooth and effective. Billie Burke, George Zucco, Lynne Carver, Reginald Owen and Mary Phillips all deserve more than passing mention.

Miss Crawford sings one song, "Who Wants Love?" which drew no response from a preview audience. Directed by Dorothy Arzner.—M-G-M.

★ Sophie Lang Goes West

We regret to say that this Paramount picture is just the opposite of the best show in town. It's another one of those jewel-swiping tales that you have seen many times before, only with a different cast. Gertrude Michael is the feminine lead this time, and though she's lovely to look at and probably delightful to know, Gertrude just doesn't click in celluloid. Though in all justice we should add that it would take a Shirley Temple to rise above this script.

The story concerns a former jewel thief, Gertrude Michael, who is on her way to California in order to get her past just as far behind as possible. En route, she meets a movie scripter, Lee Bowman, who finds the lady and her past so intriguing that he's going to write a screen yarn about it. It looks like the two will peacefully collaborate across the continent, but suddenly the plot thickens with a bang. A world-famous diamond is stolen and the heroine is accused of being in on the dirty work. From there on, the complications arise so thick and fast that it would take a Sherlock Holmes to untangle them, though we doubt if he'd care. Lee Bowman does the best he can with the role allotted to him, with his performance topping the other mediocre ones. Well, don't say we didn't tell you. Directed by Charles Riesner.—Paramount.

from the time they were two. Joan had only been knee high to a cricket when she gave a reading from "The Tempest."

She was fifteen when, to use her own quotes, "life really began." And it was all due to a broken shoulder blade.

Of course she didn't know it was broken at the time. She had been taking care of a neighbor's youngsters and they'd been wrestling on the edge of the swimming pool when she felt something snap. It wasn't until the next day that she learned it was the bone in her shoulder. They hurried her to a hospital. They took X-rays. The family physician shook his head. "She's been a semi-invalid all her life and it has to be topped with this! As soon as she can travel, I suggest a long sea trip and a complete change of scenery."

That's how it was that Joan, under the surveillance of her father, headed back for Japan. She had never been separated from Meg and Ollie before. That last afternoon they had swung down Market Street together towards the pier, not caring whether the whole of San Francisco heard them singing. They had to sing. It was either that or tears. And as the ship slipped away towards Golden Gate, there was Joan, a wind-whipped little figure clinging to a spar on the top deck.

And from below Joan, a male voice called, "Hadn't you better come down from there?" She slid down precipitately, right into his arms. He was a very presentable young man, bound for the legation in Tokio. Even before the typhoon hit them she was wearing his ring. A gorgeous blond taking a finishing course at the American Missionary school was a boon to that crowd of lonely diplomats. Before the year was up Joan had been engaged four times.

And something else took place in Japan. Somewhere, somehow, the illness that had haunted her childhood, abruptly vanished. The Joan who came back to Meg and Ollie was radiantly alive, well. That summer the three of them motored to Los Angeles for a vacation. It was meant to be for three weeks. It has lasted three years.

Ollie went to work. And Joan decided to do the same, minus any assistance from sister or family. That fetish of hers cropping up again. They had a little place in north Hollywood near Henry Duffy's. Mr. Duffy produces stage plays and Joan wanted to be an actress. She took to walking past his garden. After a while she grew bold enough to walk in and up to his door. He wasn't in the first time. Nor the second. But the third time the maid told him, smiling, "That girl's here again."

He asked Joan to read the part of the-little-girl-next-door in "Call It A Day." A month later she opened in it at the El Capitan Theatre, where Jesse L. Lasky saw her and signed her to a movie contract.

They gave Joan a small part in the Hepburn picture, "Quality Street." Then a larger one in a Class B production. And then came the lead in the Nino Martini film, "Music For Madame."

You will see her next in "Damsel In Distress." Joan Fontaine, who makes it a law to travel entirely under her own steam, who is considered one of the two finest actresses among Hollywood's younger players. The other is her sister, Olivia De Havilland.

Mary McKinnon, Randolph, Utah. Bette Davis is twenty-nine years old. No, there was no romance between Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy except on the screen! She's Mrs. Gene Raymond, now, you know. Ross Alexander did commit suicide, apparently as the result of brooding over the earlier suicide of his first wife.

Shirley Barron, Baltimore, Md. You are interested in the movies, aren't you! Well, here are your answers. Don Ameche is not in the least gray at the temples. In fact, he has almost black hair, so it was powder which fooled you in that picture. You may obtain photographs of the stars by writing to the studios where they work and enclosing twenty-five cents to cover mailing cost. The skiing scenes in "Thin Ice," were done by doubles, though Sonja Heinie knows all about such things! At the present writing, Ruby Keeler is under contract to RKO-Radio and not scheduled to make any pictures with Dick Powell. "Gone With The Wind" has not been cast as yet though there is talk that Clark Gable will play Rhett Butler opposite Paulette Goddard as Scarlett O'Hara. Nelson Eddy's next picture is "Rosalie," with Eleanor Powell.

C. M. Bennett, Traverse City, Mich. Paul Lukas will be seen shortly in "Mutiny in the Mountains," an English production.

Betty Robinson, Ovid, New York. Loretta Young has three sisters, Polly Ann Young, Sally Blane, and Georgiana Young. The first two have been in pictures, but only Sally Blane is active at the present time.

V. Norbut, Newark, N. J. I wouldn't be too upset over the rumors that Garbo is through with pictures. Each time her contract is about to expire, they crop up but she still seems to go on making pictures and probably will continue to do so.

Adelaide Harmon, Warren, Ohio. You can get a photograph of Don Ameche by writing to 20th Century-Fox, Hollywood, Calif. Enclose twenty-five cents to cover the cost of mailing.

Rose Siriday, Grantwood, N. J. The cast for "Hollywood Hotel," which has been selected thus far includes: Dick Powell, Rosemary and Lola Lane, Glenda Farrell, Hugh Herbert, Ted Healy, Alan Mowbray, Frances Langford, Raymond Paige, Ken Niles and Louella Parsons. Milton Berle can be reached in care of RKO-Radio Studios, Hollywood, California.

Alyce Unger, Gloucester, N. J. You certainly do go for Errol Flynn, don't you? He is more than six feet tall and was born in North Ireland, a direct descendant of Fletcher Christian who led the famous Mutiny on the Bounty. Errol Flynn is his real name. He is married to Lili Damita and it is his first venture. His birthday is June 20th. You're quite welcome, that's what we're here for!

And he still can't understand why people have been so nice to him, why the executives at Paramount, for instance, took one look at that face and that long, shambling figure and signed him to a long-term contract without even going through the formality of a film test. Personally, he's still trying to figure that all out. That's not true, either, Gary just doesn't try to figure anything out! He just carries on.

I was working in the publicity department at Paramount when they placed the big, gawky guy under contract. From the very first minute I saw him, I was aware of that arresting charm of his. I've known other players who affected me in somewhat the same way, but in time you get to understand the difference between the manufactured or affected charm and personality and that which a person really possesses, and you discover that even those with the natural personality have to be really "big" to take on success.

I think I realized from the very first that Gary would be "big."

During the years I've known him, Gary has never changed his viewpoint. It's hard to believe that a chap who has made as many feminine hearts go pitty-pat (including mine) can be so utterly oblivious to the fact that he has a certain something that no one else possesses.

Every time Gary has signed a new contract, I'll bet, he's wondered to himself how long it would be before they'd catch on to him. He wouldn't have been surprised to have found himself completely out of pictures at any minute. And if such a thing had actually happened, I honestly don't think it would have bothered him. He'd just go on, as usual.

There's a little leather shop in Hollywood which is owned by a fellow named Jeff Davis. He's not young, but he's still tall, thin and a trifle stoop-shouldered from years spent in the saddle. No one knows very much about Jeff, even Gary. And that's pretty surprising considering how much time Gary spends fussing around Jeff's little shop, unless you know your Cooper. Knowing him, I can understand how he can spend hours in a day chatting with the ex-cowboy, sometimes figuring out some new design in leather, sometimes just spinning yarns, and never asking Jeff anything about his private life. It would never occur to Gary to pry into anyone's business unless the information was volunteered.

Of course, this casualness of Gary's is a bit maddening at times. There was the time, when he'd been in ill-health for some months, when he felt he wanted to go to Africa. It was a long trip that had been planned, lazy days of cruising up the Nile, active moments, chasing big game, in other words, an extensive vacation. Well, other people may have worried about the career he was temporarily forsaking at a moment when he was not any too well established on the screen, but it's certain Gary didn't. I'll wager that the fact he would be off the screen for some fourteen months didn't even occur to Gary. He just went to Africa!

And when he returned to the United States, he didn't bat an eyelash when he discovered his financial affairs weren't in any too healthy a condition. He didn't even wonder if they had a picture for him to work in back in Hollywood. He just came back, in his own unflurried fashion, and reported at the studio!

"What," you might ask, "has Gary Cooper gotten out of success?"

Well, Gary wears nice clothes, might be your first reaction. That's true. Many of Gary's suits are made from imported fabrics. But that is part of Gary's business as an actor. He must at all times have an extensive wardrobe.

But if you were to catch Gary in an off-moment, you'd realize how unimportant such material things are in Gary's scheme of living (if he really has one). When he isn't working, you practically never see Gary dressed up. Nine times out of ten, he'll be wearing an old polo shirt and a pair of mussy trousers with a well-worn necktie around his waist to keep them in place. Indeed, one of Gary's favorite articles of apparel is a cheap pair of seersucker pants which he swiped, mind you, from the wardrobe department when he was working in "Now and Forever" a few years back. He'll probably continue to wear them until they literally fall off!

And during the filming of "The Plainsman," when almost everyone on the picture was requesting special props, unusual articles of wardrobe which would necessarily be discarded after the picture, what do you think Gary asked for? In his shy way, he wondered if Mr. De Mille could order him a pair of moccasins! And was no end grateful when his request was complied with.

While he was appearing in "Wedding Night," Sam Goldwyn heard that Gary had become quite attached to an old lumber-jack shirt he wore in the picture. He had six of them made for Gary as a gift. Gary was more pleased than if they had been six million dollars!

And the rest of Gary's living conditions are in keeping with his simple tastes. He has a charming but most unpretentious home in Brentwood, not at all like a movie star's home. But it satisfies Gary.

Most disillusioning, you might say. Not a bit like a movie star! But the whole world could go hang, as far as Gary is concerned, if he had to behave like an actor off the screen. He couldn't be annoyed!

Thinking over the years I've known Gary, I'm really amazed when I realize that his one real luxury, during all his years of prosperity, has been an expensive automobile. And if I were to say that Gary isn't happy because he has enough money to own a Dusenberg instead of a Ford, I'd be lying. Because Gary has been prouder and more pleased with his swell car than anything he's ever had, except, maybe, the elaborate saddle Jeff Davis made up for him a little while back.

However, if circumstances had been such that Gary could only afford a small, inexpensive car, Gary would have been just as happy, I'll swear. It's just that he had always, from the time he was a kid, been crazy about tinkering with automobiles. And what boy, large or small, wouldn't rather have a big, expensive car than a cut-down Ford? I've never heard of one.

"Has Gary's marriage changed him any?" someone asked me the other day. I thought of it as I talked with him on the set of his newest and possibly his most important picture. And I couldn't help but admit that it had. It's nothing tangible, nothing you can put your finger on. It's just a certain radiance, a look of contentment and well-being, a gleam in the eye, that didn't used to be there. Other than that, Gary might have been the same boy I met, years ago, when he was just starting out on a new career.

And Gary has been very grateful to motion pictures, to fate, to luck, to every one of those people who have pushed him up to the top. At the immediate moment, he feels he is riding the crest of the wave. A real home, a charming wife, a brand-new baby daughter, what more can a fellow ask?

According to Gary, he's been given all the breaks!

ARE YOU ONLY A THREE-QUARTER WIFE?

THERE are certain things a woman has to put up with and be a good sport.

Men, because they are men, can never understand a three-quarter wife—a wife who is all love and kindness three weeks in a month and a hell cat the rest of the time.

No matter how your back aches—no matter how loudly your nerves scream—don't take it out on your husband.

For three generations one woman has told another how to go "smiling through" with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It helps Nature tone up the system, thus lessening the discomforts from the functional disorders which women must endure in the three ordeals of life: 1. Turning from girlhood to womanhood. 2. Preparing for motherhood. 3. Approaching "middle age."

"Sure he can be in your Chaplin contest," Mrs. Berle replied. "How much is there in it?"

"The theatre was in Mt. Vernon and as far as we knew it might have been Canada," Milton explained. "It cost us $3.60 to get there and all we got was a cup worth $1.98, which was first prize. After that Mom took me around to the movie companies for work. She would always find out the day before just what type kid they wanted and then dress me accordingly. If they needed Little Lord Fauntleroy, that was me all over. When they called for a freshie from the Bronx, I was just myself.

"In this way I got some work, a little experience and, before long, into the Flora Dora kids outfit. I began my vaudeville career here and, until I reached that gawky age in my early teens, had some nice breaks. Not much money, but I worked steadily. Kids do grow up though and pretty soon I found myself too big to go on."

Most child stars retire during the "awkward age," but not our Milton. It was at this time that Sarah and young Berlenger embarked for that Land of Promise, the Philadelphia Grand Opera House. Here Berlenger became Berle. Sarah decided that the former name was too long to go up on the marquee in lights! "How d'ya like it?" Milton asks.

"This was my first appearance as a one man bill, so I was really on my own," Milton continued. "I sang songs and told a few stories and Mom was right there in the first row laughing up my jokes, putting me over. After each performance, she would tell me what I had done wrong and how to right it. Then, next day she was right out front doing the same thing all over again.

"Well, we had something there until one night a guy comes backstage and asks if I'm not the same Milton Berlenger that was with the Flora Dora. Smelling a job, I came right back with, 'Sure, that's me.' Gee, was I wrong! He was an officer from the Gerry Society and wanted to know why I wasn't in school. That taught me to keep my trap shut and let Queenie do the talking.

"It wasn't until years later, when I played Loew's State as Master of Ceremonies, that I got my big break. Mom was still sitting out front and before each show would say, 'Be good, Milton, tonight So-and-So will be out front.' How did she find out? Search me. I told you she had eyes in the back of her head!"

IN THE good old days the pinnacle of success in the profession was to play the Palace Theatre. Milton hadn't been able to accomplish this, but it wasn't long after his debut as M.C. that the opportunity fell right into his lap.

"A new show was opening at the Palace," Berle began, "and at the last minute the M.C. was taken sick. They were in an awful spot and there was nothing they could do but get me. I don't mind telling you I was plenty scared. Finally I decided to play the underdog, arouse their sympathy, and get under the audience's skin quickly. So I'd say, 'Now I'm going to tell you some jokes, the same ones that Jack Benny, Bill Fields and this Cantor guy tell at twice the salary. They're just as good and just as funny when I tell them, only I don't get the money they do. They ride to work in a big car and I walk, but we all get here just the same.' Well, this idea got me by and I stayed for another bill. After that it was smooth sailing and I landed offers to play most of the other houses on Broadway.

"One day, Richie Craig, a friend of mine, M.C. too, and I decided it would be good business to get a phoney feud started for the newspapers. Richie would wire Winchell and say, 'All that Berle guy doesn't use of my stuff is my pictures for the lobby display. Put up my photo and I'll be playing the bill.' Then I'd sit down and send Sobol a note saying, 'This Craig is stealing my stuff. It's my act, why don't I get the billing?' The papers got hold of it and went to town and the joke-stealing gag was launched. I figured that the notices would help us both and you can be sure that they did."

In case you don't know who Richie Craig is, and you should, he was a clever comedian. He became widely known as Master of Ceremonies, around the vaudeville circuits. Milton has a very interesting story for you, about his last performance

I HAD been out touring the tank towns when I got a wire from Richie to come at once. When I arrived in his dressing-room, he had collapsed and couldn't go on. I played his bill—of course, using the gag that since he had all my jokes, why shouldn't I play the bill? Well, it went over with a bang. They loved it. Richie passed away shortly afterwards without anyone knowing about our gag. You can imagine how I feel now that it has grown so big that it slaps me in the face. No one will believe we created the joke-stealing thing for a gag. It's like one of those Frenkenstein monsters; it gets so big it swallows you.

"I really don't mind the kidding, but when it gets to be accepted as gospel, then it does get under your skin. That's probably the reason that, when I finally got an offer to make a screen test, I did a scene from 'The Show is On.' Let 'em see me doing something that does belong to another comedian. I was on the road in the Bert Lahr part and so used the stockbroker scene, the one you saw in 'New Faces.' The test was good, and I was signed by another company to do one picture."

Perhaps the movie moguls were a bit slow to recognize Milton Berle's possibilities, but they needed only the release of "New Faces" to convince them they had another star on their hands. And now Mr. Berle is slated for big things, the first of which is to be the leading role in the screen version of "Room Service," one of Broadway's current hits.

And, the cinema capital being as topsy-turvy as it is today, don't be surprised to read that Sandra Berle, accompanied by her son Milton, are off to the races. Her ambitions can easily be realized in the City of Make Believe and, knowing Sarah, we look forward to the time when she'll come into her own. Good luck, Sandra!

steamed in, every whistle blowing, emblazoned with banners that shouted: "Welcome Joan and Dick." Airplanes zoomed overhead, letting down streamers that flapped: "Welcome Joan and Dick." The reporters let out a wild Indian whoop. With one impulse Joan and Dick fled from the scene.

The papers carried the story to give the impression that two movie stars had hired a reception committee to welcome themselves to New York. No, they didn't say it in so many words, but the implication was there. It made a better story than the truth, that tugboats and airplanes had been a well-meaning, if misguided, gesture on the part of friends, embarrassing no one more keenly than those it was intended to honor. And for their pains in giving the press what it wanted, they had the pleasure of reading such gems as these: "The bride tittered, and yipped: 'Ain't it cute?' "The bridegroom blushed, and tripped over his foot." One has to fill space somehow.

Dick might have said: "You would come to New York."

Joan might have said: "You didn't try to stop me."

Perhaps they realized the danger. Dick stared solemnly for a moment. Then: "Titter for me, Bride," he commanded. "Or would you prefer to yipp?"

"No," giggled Joan. "I'd rather take lessons in tripping over my foot."

Well, that was finished, and now they could enjoy themselves. Never were two people more mistaken. The papers had done their work well. All of New York knew that Joan Blondell and Dick Powell had come to town. That alone wouldn't have wrought the harm. But they kindly furnished the name of the Powells' hotel. They played up the "blushing bride and bridegroom" angle. They hinted that airplanes and tugboats would seem to indicate that the honeymooners weren't bent on seclusion.

With the result that stepping outside the door meant being swooped upon, fighting their way through crowds. Shopping was out of the question. Almost any public appearance was out of the question.

They refused to be downed. Safe behind the doors of their suite, Dick would say: "This, Mrs. Powell, is the beach at Waikiki. That sound which you fondly imagine to be the gurgle of a tap is the plash of murmuring waves. This thing that looks like a lampshade is the moon, and you don't look bad yourself," he burst into song, "in the light of the mo-o-on at Waikiki. What'll it be, ham or swiss on rye?" He'd pick up the phone, order sandwiches, and they'd sit munching and cooking up schemes of how they'd sneak out by the chimney next morning as two wisps of smoke.

After three days, Dick said: "Let's leave."

"What about Gloria's play? And oh, Dick, I do want to wear my pretty clothes."

That settled it. "We're going to the theatre tonight, and let anyone try to stop us," announced young Mr. Powell.

Young Mrs. Powell looked fearful. "Let's go early, so they won't see us prancing down the aisle and call us sensa-ing the privilege of wandering about the rooms where once only The Silent Lady walked. Incidentally, Garbo has lived in so many houses during the past few years that the "This is where Garbo slept" legends are beginning to rival the "George Washington once spent the night here" stories.

We dropped in on the "Boy of the Streets" set the other day to get a look at Jackie Cooper, who's making his first picture since "The Devil Is a Sissy." You'd be surprised at young Mr. Cooper's size. He's tall and husky, and looks almost ready to step into a romantic lead. All of which is hard to believe, when you recall that only three years ago he was the kid in "Treasure Island."

Mme. Louise Hovick, Gypsy Rose Lee on the other side of the tracks, recently delivered herself of the statement that never again would she view herself in the movies. After seeing her debut in "You Can't Have Everything" she made the momentous decision. "It was such a shock," she said, "seeing myself in such detail. It was like letting the public pry into my innermost secrets. The stage," she concluded, "leaves a little to the imagination, but not the movies." And we can remember Miss Hovick when she was the featured attraction at the Irving Place Burlesque in New York. All she left to the imagination was her phone number.

Questions without Answers: What young star, recently married, told her friends a few days before the elopement that she'd never marry the man in question? It was a studio romance, she said, and that was all. Well, maybe what she has now is a studio marriage, whatever that is.

Producers are finally waking up to the amazing popularity of cowboy star Gene Autry. The requests coming to MODERN SCREEN'S Information Desk show him leading the field by a more than comfortable margin, yet no major studio executive had ever seen Gene Autry on the screen. However, the word got to 20th Century-Fox, and Darryl Zanuck is attempting to buy the Autry contract from Republic studios.

When Warner Baxter and his stand-in, Frank McGrath, met eight years ago, they both wore the same size hat. The other day when Warner showed up on the set with a new hat, McGrath tried it on. It rested precariously on the top of his head. "Hmmm," hmmmed McGrath, "look what Baxter's success has done to me!"

Joan Davis ("Olga From the Volga" in "Thin Ice") generally feels just like the tired end of a double feature bill when her nightly bedtime arrives. Seems Miss D. has a four-year-old daughter named Beverly, and Beverly's hobby is watching mamma go through all the routines she has just finished at the studio. So far Joan has lost eight pounds and her daughter's respect.

It's said that Ginger, like many movie-goers, admires the Riskin dialogue.

The most expensive Shoes may RUIN BABY'S FEET

X-Ray of baby foot in a properly fitted Wee Walker Shoe.

X-Ray of baby foot in an expensive shoe that has been outgrown.

Many a mother, with the best intentions, is RUINING her baby's feet by buying expensive shoes and then failing to discard them when they are outgrown. The X-Ray shows how terribly little bones are warped and twisted in outgrown shoes.

Save baby's feet with inexpensive Wee Walker Shoes and change to new ones often. Wee Walkers have every feature baby needs. They are made over live-model lasts, hence are correctly proportioned, full-sized, roomy shoes that give real barefoot freedom. Good-looking, soft, pliable leathers. Because they are made by the largest manufacturers of infant shoes exclusively, and are sold in stores with very low selling cost the price is very low. tion-hunters or something awful. Let's go right after dinner."

"Let's go before dinner."

"And we won't go out to smoke in the intermission."

"What can they do to us?" Dick shrugged.

This is what they did. They tore off Joan's orchids, they pulled four tails from her sable cape and kept them as souvenirs, they all but knocked her down in their efforts to get to Dick, they all but smashed Dick's toes to get to her. They clung to the runningboard of the taxi, so that Dick had to warn the driver not to start, lest someone be hurt. While they were being dislodged, the two inside sat digging their nails into each other's palms.

Arrived at the theatre, they had to be spirited out to wait on a chilly fire-escape till the play started. Joan was protected by her furs. Dick, clammy with nervousness, caught cold and went to bed that night with a high fever.

He stayed there for a week. Joan stayed beside him. This wasn't so funny, but at least no one bothered them. Once Joan threw a coat over her shoulders and ran down to the lobby to have a prescription filled. She was instantly besieged. "Where's Dick, where's Dick?"

"Gone away for a week," she flung back over her shoulder, and with grim pleasure envisioned a buzzing chorus of "Hm! Just married and gone away for a week!"

THEY bade New York goodbye without regrets, and tried to remember only its lighter moments. Sometimes, when they hear a whistle blow, Dick will murmur: "That's us in town again." They even have Normie, the youngster, doing it. One day, when he saw the big Zeppelin that floats 'round Los Angeles advertising tires, he looked up and asked: "Mommy, does that say, 'Welcome Joan and Dick?'"

They'd gone through their ordeal by fire, and come out with their humor unscathed. They'd learned it was better to laugh than rage over what couldn't be helped. They applied the lesson. If Joan comes in to find Dick worrying over a script, she goes promptly into the act that never fails to leave him grinning. It's a kind of Ruth Draperian monologue, featuring a screwball hostess, and never runs twice the same way, but generally starts off something like this: "Goodbye. I told the servants you were coming. We have breakfast at three, and the bathroom's done in lavender and old lace, only the lace doesn't stand up very well. You have to coddle it. You'll find me in the icebox in the morning—"

Every once in a while Joan will decide to go on a diet. "All right," says Dick. "I'll go with you. For better, for worse." They instruct the cook not to give them any food. They sit eating their meagre dinner, giving each other verbal pats on the back, and finish, feeling noble but empty.

It isn't long before Dick spies a hungry gleam in the eye of his wife. He starts humming: "I — have a — feeling — we're STAR-ving." With one accord, they steal toward the kitchen. Dick pushes stealthily at the door. If the cook spies him, he beams good evening, and beats a retreat. If she's mercifully absent, they descend on the icebox and raid it.

They agree about most things and, when they don't, they can always get a chuckle out of their disagreement. Each insists that the other suffers from what they call telephonitis. "Dick," says Joan, "was born with a receiver in his mouth."

"So help me," says Dick, "she phones three times as much as I do. I kept track one day. I will say for her that she doesn't go into these 'he said' and 'she

The perfect bit of casting has just happened at RKO. In "Bringing Up Baby," Katharine Hepburn is sharing honors with a leopard. Cary Grant is in the picture, too, but it's the leopard that's drawing all the comment. They're betting three to one that before the picture is completed the spotted thespian will march into the front office and tell the boys he can't take it any longer.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE . . .

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

said' horrors, like a lot of women. She just has to be sure that an earthquake hasn't struck her family since the last time she talked to them five minutes ago. Here's Joanie calling her mother." He jumped up and held a receiver to his ear. "Hello, are you all right, yes I'm fine, goodbye."

Dick yearns for a boat. Joan thinks it would be all right, but lacks her husband's fine passion for the rigging. "When would we use it?" she inquires reasonably.

"I don't know," he confesses, and clutches dramatically at her hand. "Pray for me, Wife. Pray I don't buy a boat."

DICK'S a handy man around the house. He can hang a door or build a cupboard with the best of them. Joan is secretly proud of his skill, but a little wary of a tendency he has to improve on what she already considers perfect. So when she sees him marching by with his toolchest, she's likely to inquire: "Building a new wing today, darling? Or just a new house?"

She sleeps soundly, Dick lightly. Even when they're both working, her rising hour precedes his, because of the more complicated problems of feminine make-up. This is Dick, describing an early morning scene: "The buzzer from the kitchen rings at 5:30. I wake up. To wake Joan would require, in addition to the buzzer, two kitchen stoves and part of a brick factory falling through the roof. I yell: 'Hey, Joan, time to get up.' She makes a cute noise that might be a small pig grunting. I yell again. She says, 'O.K., honey,' but it doesn't mean anything. I wait five minutes, because I'm sorry for the poor kid, but if she insists on being a movie actress, what can you do? Then I call again. She says, 'Uh-huh,' and I hear noises. So I snooze off, with an uneasy mind, which wakes me up about five minutes later, and there's my wife sleeping sweetly on the floor, with a pillow under her head. She likes her comfort."

What fun they can't provide for themselves, the baby supplies. He and Dick, to whom he is Slug or Butch, form a mutual admiration society. Fifteen minutes in the morning belong by sacred and traditional right to Normie. Nothing is allowed to interfere. Normie sees to that. The studio may want Dick a little earlier, important persons may be waiting, the heavens may fall. Normie points inexorably to the clock, because he knows a clock has something to do with it. "My fifteen minutes," he says, and means it.

Whatever Dick does, Normie is seized with a prompt impulse to do. "I want to pull a knife over my chin. Why doesn't hair grow on mine, too? I want to look like you." He's adopted Dick's special word of approval, the word being, originally enough, "brokendown." "That's a nice brokendown tie," Dick is wont to say. One night his mother broke into an irrepressible giggle at some tomfoolery of her husband's. "That's a nice brokendown laugh, Mommy," Norman told her.

On the dresser of each, stands a handsome cabinet photograph of the other. Pasted over the glass are two screwy snapshots. One shows Joan, finger in mouth, hair in tight pigtails tied with fantastic bows, face splashed with freckles. The other shows Dick, his jaws stretched in a cavernous yawn.

The snaps are a joke, of course, but they're more than just that. They imply a gesture, typical of them both. Two human beings are putting two movie stars in their places. Not in so many words, but in spirit and intent they are saying: "We're Joan and Dick. The rest doesn't matter. Let's laugh—and love the unimportant things off."

★★★ Victoria the Great

In this British-produced chronicle of the life and times of Queen Victoria, a great age passes in review. We follow Victoria from her ascension to the throne as a timid girl of seventeen, completely under her mother's domination, to her Diamond Jubilee sixty years later, when she had made of herself one of the strongest, most independent and beloved of women. Celebrated figures such as Disraeli, Gladstone, Lord Palmerston, Lord Beaverbrook, Lord Melbourne and Cecil Rhodes are woven into the complex story. We see the formation and expansion of a vast empire and the struggle to put down rebellion at home and avert wars abroad, all faithfully mirrored.

At times the film seems to carry the weight of English history too heavily for the taste of the average American and becomes ponderous and tedious. Nevertheless, there are many stirring and truly impressive moments. The life of Victoria, which to most Americans has come to stand for primness personified, has been lightened with quiet humorous touches and sympathetic treatment. The romance between the Queen and her Prince Consort, Albert, is charmingly handled, and her long fight, never successful, to win for her German husband the approval of her conservative people, motivates the picture.

Outstanding in the cast are Anna Neagle, who portrays the difficult role of Queen Victoria from youth to old age; H. B. Warner, who dominates the too-brief scenes in which he appears; Anton Walbrook, Walter Rilla and Mary Morris. Directed by Herbert Wilcox.—RKO-Radio.

★★ Angel

There's something about the ice-cold presence of Marlene Dietrich which fills directors with awe. Even the best of them get the worst of it when they tangle with the Teutonic Deadpan. Throughout her entire Hollywood career she has managed to walk through each of her epics without a single change of expression in her lovely face. No smile ever mars her sphynx-like beauty, no trace of emotion ever crosses her velvet-smooth brow. All of which is to say that Toots can't act. She can't emote because she has no emotions. Even at that, how she can collect her quarter of a million a picture and keep that straight face is beyond us.

This time, as usual, she is a woman whose beauty drives men mad. Her husband, in the British consulate, is more interested in Jugo-Slavia than in domestic matters, so she winds up for an affair off the home field. After considerable stagey dramatics the affair doesn't come off, and Marlene returns to her husband who, it seems, has just undergone a romantic reawakening.

Herbert Marshall and Melvyn Douglas are effective as husband and would-be lover, but their material seems to weigh heavily on them. The only bright moments in the picture are furnished by the household servants, played by Ernest Cossart, Edward Everett Horton and Herbert Mundin. Ernst Lubitsch directed, but the anticipated "Lubitsch touches" are missing.—Paramount.

Many Never Suspect Cause Of Backaches

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning shows there may be something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

An excess of acids or poisons in your blood, when due to functional kidney disorders, may be the cause of nagging backache, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

★★ Music For Madame

Nino Martini is back again in this one. And that will undoubtedly be enough to send you rushing to see "Music for Madame." You won't be disappointed in Martini's glorious voice either, but neither his role nor the picture can touch that last success, "The Gay Desperado."

Here Martini is a poor Italian lad who heads for Hollywood to make fame and fortune with his voice. En route he falls into bad hands. Two crooks are planning to steal some pearls from a wealthy Hollywood producer and trick Martini into helping them. He is to sing at the reception and while attracting everyone's attention, the meanies will grab the poils. Having unwittingly become an accomplice, Martini then finds that they have also stolen his most precious possession, his voice. For the only clue to the thief is the singer with the golden voice, and Rodowsky, the famed conductor (Alan Mowbray), swears he will recognize that voice anywhere. Romance starts when Joan Fontaine, an aspiring young composer, meets Martini. He, of course, cannot divulge his identity, and then later tries every way to prove his identity to the police in order that Joan may collect the price on his head.

It's genuinely hilarious in spots, though many of the scenes with Detective Alan Hale, Erik Rhodes and Grant Mitchell, the district attorney, lack spontaneity. Others in the cast include: Billy Gilbert, George Shelley, Lee Patrick and Ada Leonard. Directed by John Blystone.—RKO-Radio.

★ Dangerously Yours

You've seen this one before if you're in the habit of sitting through the poorer pictures on the double bill. For it's just another of those jewel-lifting stories, with the beauteous blonde a gal who may swipe your diamonds, but who underneath you know—or will by the end of the seventh reel—has a heart of gold.

Phyllis Brooks is the feminine interest in this case and if her acting ever comes up to her looks, her studio has a good bet. Cesar Romero is the tall, dark and handsome of the picture. He's much too capable for the material at hand. Here he is a gentleman, who, from all indications should be regarded with suspicion. Later on, of course, it develops that his intentions are all strictly honorable. The story's one claim to holding interest is the fact that all the characters look shady, and you stay on waiting for the first spark of honesty to show up in somebody. Alan Dinehart gives the best and most believable performance, as Mr. Dinehart has a habit of doing, while Jane Darwell and Natalie Garson come in for some good bits. Directed by Mal St. Clair.—20th Century-Fox.

★ This Way, Please

A musical of a decidedly minor nature, "This Way, Please" is destined for the bottom position in the double-feature emporiums. Its plot is standard, its lines are dull, and an uninspired cast stirs up practically no enthusiasm whatever. They all perform as though they knew that eventually the picture would be given away with the cash on bank night.

Story concerns the love life of an usherette and a theatre band leader. The little usherette is really a talented dancer, and eventually becomes a feature of the theatre's entertainment, and winds up marrying the band leader at a public ceremony on the stage.

Buddy Rogers does little with the role of the orchestra leader. Betty Grable dances

★★★ Wife, Doctor and Nurse

Though it's definitely a woman's picture, it seems unlikely there's a man alive who couldn't get some enjoyment out of watching Loretta Young and Virginia Bruce. Warner Baxter is the fortunate man who has these two girls clamoring for him. Loretta is his wife and Virginia his nurse, and both are that nice civilized sort who decide to talk it all over and try to reach some kind of agreement as to who shall have Warner.

The only one whom they fail to talk it over with is Warner, who goes blissfully on, genuinely in love with his wife and fully dependent upon his nurse in his career. When the two women, in a burst of great generosity, decide to give Warner up completely to the other, the fun begins. For it's obvious that he cannot get along without either and finally solves the situation by telling that to them, and all three become fine friends.

The plot, of course, is an old one. But what makes it a good picture is the fine dialogue and the excellent performances of everyone concerned. No expense has been spared in production, with the elaborate settings and costly wardrobes further notes of added interest. In the supporting cast are Jane Darwell, who plays the doctor's housekeeper; Paul Hurst, excellent in a small role as bartender, and Margaret Irving, Minna Gombel, George Ernest and Maurice Cass. Directed by Walter Lang. —20th Century-Fox.

★ Bulldog Drummond Comes Back

John Howard plays the title role, and the assignment proves too much for him. His overacting, plus the series of unbelievably harrying situations into which he's forced, make "Bulldog Drummond" a picture strictly for juveniles and the less sophisticated adults. John Barrymore hasn't much to do as Inspector Neilson, but he steals the picture with his smooth performance. Louise Campbell makes the most of the feminine lead, but Reginald Denny and E. E. Clive are wasted in thankless roles. Directed by Louis King.—Paramount.

★ Love Is on the Air

This little number deserves mention for just one reason and that's Ronald Reagan, one of the newest finds of the Warner Brothers. On the credit side of the ledger for Ronald are an engagingly wide grin and a nice manner. On the debit side are a mediocre voice and obvious lack of camera experience, traits which can undoubtedly be overcome with a little time.

Reagan is a political commentator for a radio station, and in trying to clear up the city's dirty politics, he becomes so rabid on the air that his boss tries to fire him. However, there's a little matter of contract, as Reagan points out to him, so the boss gets even by putting our hero on the "Itsy Bitsy People's Hour" as storyteller, a program gladly relinquished by June Travis, who formerly was the storyteller.

Love blooms, of course, along with the usual bickering and bantering that goes on between the lovers of every Grade B

★★ Madame X

That old favorite, "Madame X," is here served up again. But there is none of the warmed-over flavor which one might expect, due to the excellence of the cast.

Gladys George's characterization of the woman who sacrifices her life that her son's life may not be blighted by a mistake which she has made, is expertly achieved. John Beal, as the son, gives a sincere performance, though we could have done without such heavy histrionics in spots. Warren William, the unrelenting husband who decides to forgive and forget about ten reels too late, does a polished bit, as does Reginald Owen, his close friend.

Others in the supporting cast are Emma Dunn, as the faithful nurse and good friend of the family, Lynne Carver, who plays John Beal's fiancee and Henry Daniell as the suave and ruthless gambler who is the cause of Madame X's final sacrifice.

The most remarkable phase of the picture is the disintegration of the woman who goes steadily down in the world, not caring or thinking of anything but the son who must never know of her existence. The gradual changes, from a lady of position to a sodden hag are exceptionally realized by Gladys George, without a flaw in appearance, voice or actions. If you're in the mood, then, for an obvious tear-jerker, with good acting for compensation, take in "Madame X." Directed by Sam Wood.—M-G-M.

★ Fit For a King

This may not be the worst Joe E. Brown picture ever made, but it will serve as such until something really bad comes along. Inveterate Joe E. Brown followers know that the main assets of his pictures are plenty of fast and furious action and practically no plot. Evidently his producers forgot to glance at the rule book, for this is plotted to death, and there are long dull passages between the brief doses of slapstick action.

The big-mouthed comic is handicapped mainly by his script. Dialogue, when it isn't tangled up in the plot, is a catalogue of old jokes. Sample: Joe E.: "You're from America, aren't you?" Helen Mack: "Yes." Joe E.: "Which part?" Helen: "All of me." That gives you a rough idea.

The ebullient Mr. Brown plays a dumb newspaper reporter sent abroad to untangle complications in a mythical kingdom. Helen Mack, for some reason or other, is a princess from Kansas, and there are numerous mysterious characters who walk in and out of the picture whispering ominous sounding messages to each other. There are two good scenes—one with Mr. B. in the ship's brig during a storm, and another with the comic riding a broken down haywagon to rescue the heroine. Helen Mack is pretty and effective enough for what she has to do, and Paul Kelly does an able job as a rival newspaperman. Directed by Edward Sedgwick.—RKO-Radio

"I don't want to play 'Hamlet,'" says Edward Everett Horton, "because—"

But we'll let Mr. H. go into that in January Modern Screen.

Hit pictures—comedy and drama—that you won't want to miss

★★★★ 100 Men and a Girl

Just one word can do justice to this picture. Superb. And after this picture, movie-goers will be clamoring for more of Leopold Stokowski and his famous orchestra. They are the real "stars" of this one, though Deanna Durbin and a cast of well-known screen personalities do the best work of their various screen careers.

The story concerns a group of one hundred poverty-stricken musicians, one of whom is Adolphe Menjou. His little daughter, Deanna Durbin, sets out to get them the recognition they justly deserve, and the wherewithal to keep them from starving to death. A flighty society woman, Alice Brady, gives her insincere promise to sponsor the orchestra of unemployed men, and takes the next boat to Europe. In desperation, Deanna sets out again to get Leopold Stokowski to direct her orchestra for one night.

There's laughter and tears aplenty in this, with the magnificent music throughout heightening every emotion to a pitch never before reached through the moving-picture medium. Directed by Henry Koster.—Universal.

★★★ The Great Garrick

Give a group of good actors an actors' holiday, and you're bound to emerge with a first-rate picture. The story is delightful fiction, based on the life of the great English actor, David Garrick. When Garrick, after triumphs in London, is invited to play in Paris, the members of the Comedie Francaise evolve a plan to separate Garrick from his exaggerated ego. The players take over an inn where Garrick is to stop on his way to Paris, and the matinee idol's arrival starts off fireworks which sparkle and burst throughout the rest of the picture.

It is Brian Aherne's picture, and Mr. A. gets everything possible from his high comedy role of the great actor. The entire cast is splendid. Edward Everett Horton deserves special mention for a split-second scene in which he goes mad, Etienne Girardot is swell as a worried little prompter, Melville Cooper brings grand comedy to the role of the president of the Comedie Francaise, Luis Alberni is amusing as an actor playing a waiter, and Marie Wilson adds comic touches as a chambermaid. Olivia De Havilland, as an innocent young gal tossed into the midst of all this, is completely captivating. Directed by James Whale.—Warner Bros.

★★★ Double Wedding

If you've never seen Myrna Loy with paint smeared all over her face, and if you've never viewed William Powell in a fur coat and a beret, you're in for something in "Double Wedding." It's one of those goofy farces which the films have been overdoing lately, but fortunately for this one, the competent playing of Mr. Powell and the lovely Miss Loy keeps the picture from going overboard.

Miss Loy plays a prim business woman who manages other people's lives as systematically as she runs her own. Having announced the engagement of her sister, Irene (Florence Rice), to a spineless character named Waldo (John Beal), she smugly sits back to await the planned wedding. But she reckons without Charlie Lodge, an irrepressible guy who lives in a trailer and hates schedules. Everything winds up to a beautiful climax in a wedding scene in Charlie's trailer. Among other lively incidents in this scene there is the spectacle of Miss Loy smacking Mr. Powell with a guitar.

Bill Powell brings all his suave mannerisms and his gift for comedy to the role of Charlie, and Myrna Loy does equally as well as the firm young lady. John Beal and Florence Rice are excellent in featured roles, and Jessie Ralph, Edgar Kennedy and Sidney Toler are outstanding among the supporting players. Directed by Richard Thorpe.—M-G-M.

LAURITZ MELCHIOR of the Metropolitan Opera finds Luckies gentle on his throat... even under this strain

LAURITZ MELCHIOR is known as the greatest Wagnerian tenor in the world. His roles . . . such as "Tristan"... are among the most difficult—and hence the most throat-taxing—in opera. So it means a lot to every smoker when Mr. Melchior says: "I prefer Luckies for the sake of my throat."

Luckies are the one and only cigarette that employs the "Toasting" process, the special process that removes certain throat irritants found in all tobacco — even the finest.

And Luckies do use the finest tobacco. Sworn records show that among independent tobacco experts — auctioneers, buyers, warehousemen, etc. — Lucky Strike has twice as many exclusive smokers as all other cigarettes combined.

In the impartial, honest judgment of those who spend their lives buying, selling and handling tobacco...who know tobacco best ... it's Luckies — 2 to 1.

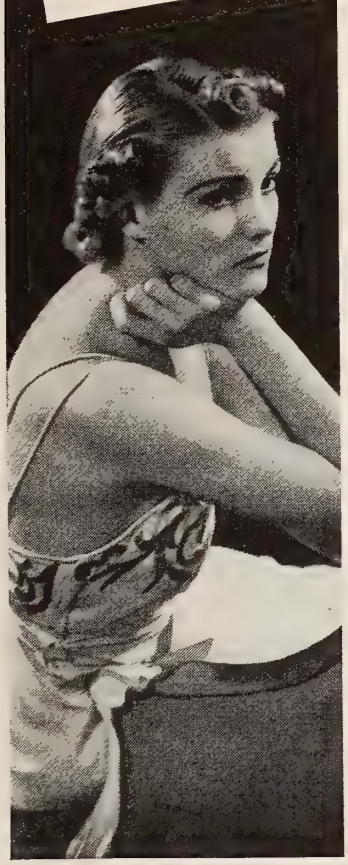
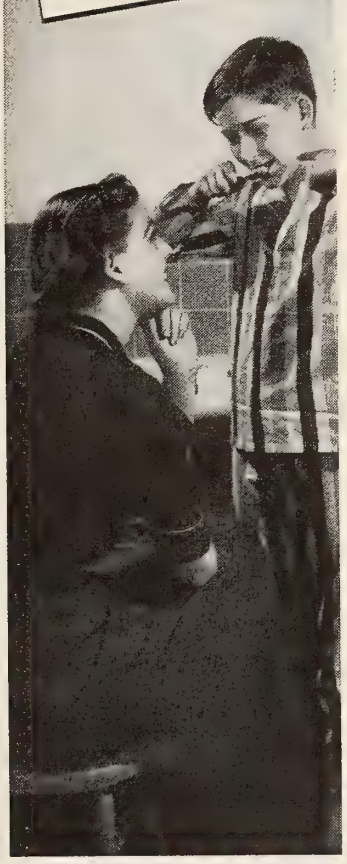
THE ADVENTURES OF MARCO POLO



Screen Romances

● The story of Marco Polo, traveller, adventurer . . . a stirring romance during the colorful reign of Kublai Khan. Exciting conflict and brilliant spectacle are woven into an adventurous and intriguing love story set against the background of the Orient.



The private life of this great adventurer is one of magnificent courage and overpowering love . . . a love which caused him to pit two empires against each other that he might take a Princess home—his bride!

With all its turbulence —conflict—splendor— "The Adventures of Marco Polo," starring Gary Cooper, appears in the JANUARY issue— on sale at all newsstands!

Foolish Joan... Tonight she's a picture of breath-taking loveliness—yet she hasn't had a dancing partner all evening. (And who can blame them...when they see her pitiful, tragic smile?)

Her small brother could show Joan how to help win a lovely smile—to have teeth that sparkle, gums firm and healthy! (Bob is only six, but he's already learned the value of gum massage.)

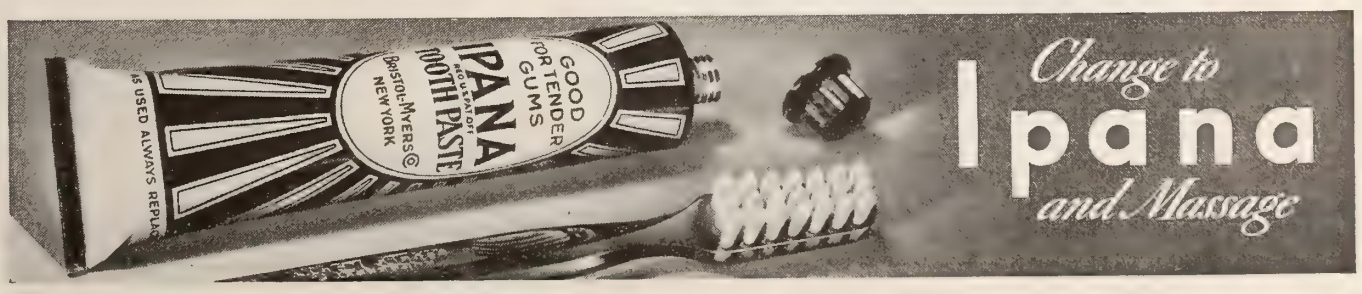
Joan's telephone would be one of the busiest in town—her date book would always be filled—if she only realized no man can resist the appeal and charm of a radiant smile! (Ipana Tooth Paste and massage would help her—for, remember, gums need care and attention as well as teeth!)

Ask yourself this question—

"Does my Smile really attract others?"

WONDERFUL, isn't it—the quick magic a smile can work when it reveals brilliant and sparkling teeth! Shocking, isn't it—the disappointment that follows a smile that reveals dull and dingy teeth—tragic evidence of "pink tooth brush" disregarded.

"Pink Tooth Brush" may rob you of loveliness



"Pink tooth brush" is only a warning—but when you see it, see your dentist! You may not be in for serious trouble—but let your dentist decide. Usually, however, it only means gums that have grown tender under our modern soft foods—gums that need more work and, as your dentist may advise, "gums that need the help of Ipana and massage."

Ipana, with massage, is especially designed to help promote healthy gums—as well as keep the teeth bright and sparkling. Massage a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation quickens in the gum tissues—your gums become firmer, more resistant, more immune to trouble.

Change to Ipana and massage, today. Help keep your gums firmer, stronger—your smile brilliant, sparkling, attractive—with Ipana and massage!

Lovely Lynne Carver finds her touch of glitter in the green mirrored ornaments that star the blouse of this smart, black crepe afternoon dress. It's smart enough to wear to dinner and the theatre with your best beau, too!

Pretty Betty Jaynes chooses a black wool crepe dinner gown, embroidered with silver for glamorous evenings. Yes, wool crepe, once strictly a utilitarian fabric, has graduated from the sports class.

THERE'S GLAMOR IN GLITTER

TWINKLE, twinkle, every star! That's Hollywood's watchword and motto this gay winter season. For the stars of the screen, not content with merely outshining the stars of the heavens by the light of their own brand of glamor, are adding further radiance to their already sparkling personalities by adopting whole-heartedly, the new mode of glitter.

Flash like a firefly! Shimmer like the Milky Way! Sparkle! No matter what you call it, that's what you must do this winter, if you're going to follow the fashions of your screen favorites.

Gone is the wide-eyed ingenue. Instead, this winter you'll be alluring, sophisticated, devastatingly feminine, a siren in sequins, or brocade, or metallics, or lamé. You'll have a touch of glitter about you someplace, whether it's in the fabric of your dress or in your ornaments or accessories, whether it's sequins, gold, or jewelled trimmings.

Hollywood and Paris agree perfectly for once, and both are going in for glitter in a beeg way. Inspired by the styles of the Gay Nineties and by the fireworks displays at the Paris Exposition last summer, the designers have outdone (Continued on page 61)

And you must sparkle, too, if you follow movie star fashions

Women, glamorous and gay, who welcomed Marco . . . sharing their hearts and secrets for a brief hour...then, remembering.

The proud princess... whose guarded pagoda was stormed by whispers and sighs...teaching a stranger how to really love.

The cunning and trickery of the East...an adventurer's blundering luck...matching wits for the world's treasures in trade.

The clash of mighty armies...a hero's sword slashing his way... and then, with his beloved safe in his arms, across the bridge that even today in Peiping is called the Marco Polo Bridge.

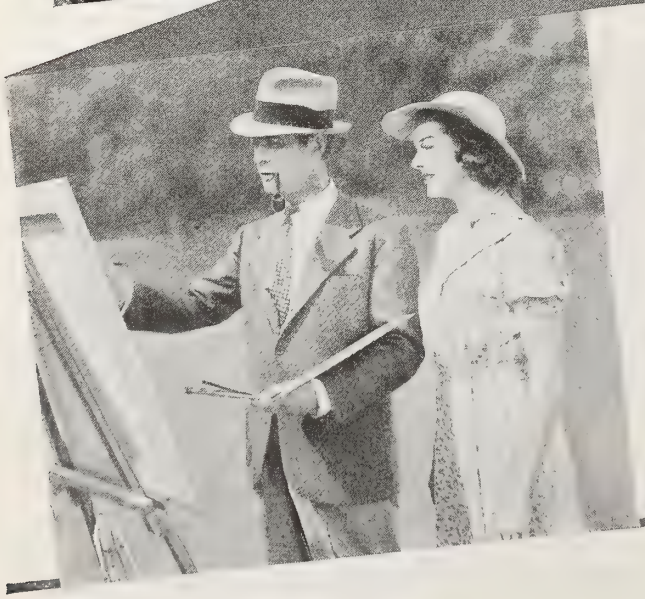
REVIEWS • A TOUR

★★★★ Conquest

Magnificent in every sense of the word, "Conquest" will go down in cinema history as one of the finest pictures ever to come out of Hollywood. It has beauty and grandeur, a brilliant script and two of the most superb performances you will see on the screen in many seasons.

In bringing to films the story of Napoleon's love for the Polish countess, Marie Walewska, Garbo has been given what is undoubtedly the finest role of her career. She plays Marie Walewska with a warmth and understanding which makes the character live. Brilliant as her performance is, it does not overshadow the Napoleon of Charles Boyer. Looking exactly like Napoleon, Boyer makes the little Corsican the picture's dominant character. He will make audiences understand all the passion, the ruthlessness and the intensely human quality of the man.

Story covers the career of Napoleon from the time he enters the life of the Polish countess until his final banishment from France. It follows the love story, Napoleon's overpowering desire for conquest and the bitter defeat at Waterloo. Every minute of it is enthralling.



Dame May Whitty, as Napoleon's mother, and Maria Ouspenskaya, as the Countess' sister-in-law, head the supporting cast with splendid performances. Others outstanding are Henry Stephenson, George Houston, Leif Erikson and Claude Gillingwater. Directed by Clarence Brown—M-G-M.

★★★ Heidi

This is everything a good Shirley Temple picture should be. It shows off America's new Sweetheart in her most lovable manner. It allows her to dance and sing, and the entire production is done on the lavish scale so befitting the box-office renown of its star. Against a beautiful Alpine background, Shirley perpetrates more good deeds in one picture than the Boy Scouts could accomplish in a year. An orphan left by a mean aunt to live with a snarling old grandfather (Jean Hersholt), reputed by the villagers to be an infidel, Shirley soon softens the heart of the aged one and in a short time has him lustily singing hymns in church every Sunday. Then, spirited away by the same mean aunt who takes her to the big city and sells her to a rich household as companion to a crippled girl, Shirley continues her good work by teaching her new friend to walk, thus foiling a nasty governess who hoped, by keeping the child helpless, to win the love of the girl's father. The vengeful governess takes Shirley out and tries to sell her to the gypsies (perish the thought!), but grandfather arrives on the scene at the proper moment and all is sunshine once more.

Jean Hersholt gives a splendid performance as the grandfather, and Arthur Treacher, Mary Nash, Mady Christians and Marcia Mae Jones are outstanding in lesser roles. Directed by Allan Dwan.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Live, Love and Learn

Using a formula plot, Metro has emerged with an entertaining little comedy drama of the light and sophisticated school, the success of which is due mainly to the players in the three top roles. The three are Robert Montgomery, Rosalind Russell and Robert Benchley, and all the picture's brighter moments are theirs.

The teaming of Montgomery and Russell proves a wise move, for they handle their bantering comedy roles even better than they did their more dramatic assignments in "Night Must Fall." Miss Russell, particularly, shows herself adept at this type of thing. Reviewers can no longer refer to her as a minor league Myrna Loy—her comedy is big-time stuff now.

The story is routine, employing the well-worn triangle theme, but the dialogue and the performances lift it above average entertainment. Robert Benchley, in his fattest screen role to date, gets many laughs as a convivial and constant house guest of Mr. M. and Miss R In the lesser roles Monty Wooley, as an art dealer, Helen Vinson as Miss Russell's rival, and E. E. Clive in one of his British carica tures, are outstanding. Directed by George Fitzmaurice.—M-G-M.

BY LEO TOWNSEND

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★★ The Awful Truth

The nonsensical comedy vogue, which has been worked pretty nearly to death in recent pictures, gets a new lease on life. Reason is that "The Awful Truth" is a swell show—the best of its kind this season. Using the same basic ingredients employed in most of the recent barrage of insane farce, Director Leo McCarey has fashioned a comedy materpiece, proving that all a pictures needs is a good script, a good cast—and Mr. McCarey.

Plot is based on the marital tribulations of Cary Grant and Irene Dunne. After a spat they decide on divorce, and Mr. G. takes up with a fluffy-headed night-club singer (Joyce Compton) and a society belle (Molly Lamont), while Miss D. devotes her time to a hardy oil man from the west (Ralph Bellamy). In the process of their Getting Back Together Again, some of the year's finest screen entertainment is unreeled.

Cary Grant establishes himself as Hollywood's Number One romantic comedian, and Irene Dunne, after her disappointing work in "High, Wide and Handsome" makes a swell comeback. Ralph Bellamy is perfect as the pure and honest oil man, and Joyce Compton deserves mention for her hilarious rendition of "Gone With the Wind." Alexander D'Arcy, Cecil Cunningham and Esther Dale are outstanding.—Columbia

When it comes to kidding Hollywood, the home town boys don't have to bow to anyone. "Stand-in" gives the picture business a satirical and very amusing kick in the pants, and although its author, Clarence Budington Kelland, isn't a Hollywood son, you can thank the local boys and girls for pointing the thing up and giving it the wallop which makes it one of the season's funniest films.

Everything happens when Atterbury Dodd, of the conservative banking firm of Pennypacker, Pennypacker & Pennypacker, arrives in Hollywood to take over management of Colossal Studio, which is failing in spite of its impressive title. Mr. Dodd knows little of life and nothing of Hollywood (he'd never even heard of Shirley Temple!), but he learns about both in a hurry.

Leslie Howard turns in a grand comedy job in the role of the bewildered Mr. Dodd, and Joan Blondell, in the title role, is a constant delight as a flip-cracking film trouper. Watch for her devastating impersonation of Shirley Temple singing "The Good Ship Lollipop." Next in the acting honors is Humphrey Bogart in the role of a producer disillusioned by alcohol and his pathetic love for a phoney screen siren, ably played by seductive Marla Shelton. Alan Mowbray gets plenty of laughs as a Russian director, and J. C. Nugent and Tully Marshall are effective as the Pennypackers. Directed by Tay Garnett—Walter Wanger

★★★ Ali Baba Goes to Town

Eddie Cantor, according to reports, has a terrific following in radio. Chances are he won't lose any of them as a result of his new starring picture, but he won't add any new customers. What we're trying to say is that "Ali Baba Goes To Town" is amusing more because of its final script than because of any of its performances, including Mr. Cantor's.

The story has Cantor, an extra in an Arabian movie, take an overdose of sleeping powders and wake up in ancient Bagdad. The Sultan (Roland Young) is having trouble with his subjects, so Cantor steps in, employs New Deal tactics, teaches the natives swing music and turns the country upside down. There is gentle and often witty lampooning of the present administration, and there are a couple of standout musical numbers by the six musicians who call themselves the Raymond Scott Quintette.

Cantor works hard in his role, and devotees of his type of comedy will undoubtedly applaud his antics. Roland Young is wasted in the role of the Sultan, and Louise Hovick, as his conniving wife, shows more anatomy than dramatic skill. A somewhat tepid romance is handled amateurishly by Tony Martin and June Lang. Directed by David Butler.—20th Century Fox.

A CORNER ON XMAS PIE

BY MARJORIE DEEN

Here, at last, in Dorothy Lamour's tempting Christmas Pie, is a dessert that is not too rich to follow that heavy dinner you're going to have.

On the "Big Broadcast" set, Dorothy builds up energy for her next scene with a handful of delicious raisins.

Dorothy Lamour would like you to try her favorite holiday desserts, because they're so unusual

REMEMBER Little Jack Horner's famous Christmas Pie, the one from which "he pulled out a plum"? Well, I learned something interesting the other day about that feat of his, during a conversation with Dorothy Lamour. It seems that it wasn't a plum that he drew out at all, but a raisin. For, traditionally, a Christmas Pie is one which, like Mince Pie, is simply chockful of raisins and has no more relation to plums than does a Plum Pudding!

I discovered, after further research, that the English give to raisins, when they are used as a cooking ingredient, the term "plums"—for no good reason that I've been able to unearth! But, anyway, that's how it happens that at Christmas time, though we refer to plums, it's really raisins we plan to use when making up the various tempting desserts with which we top off our Yuletide feasts.

One of the nicest desserts I've heard about in some time is Dorothy's version of Jack Horner's Christmas Pie. But you'd never go sit in a corner, like Jack did, to eat it, for this treat deserves a place in the spotlight. This pastry dessert is even nicer than Mince Pie because it isn't too rich, which certainly is a point in its favor when you realize that it is intended to be served after a rich holiday meal. Another pleasant feature is that it's easy to make.

You haven't much time, you know, for cooking experiments or household pursuits when you're playing in pictures. You have even less leisure, of course, when you add a weekly radio broadcast to your other activities as does Miss Lamour. So Dorothy must confine her cooking efforts to infrequent sallies into the kitchen to prepare the one or two dishes which both she and her husband, Herbie Kaye, enjoy as a change from restaurants and night-club fare. Throughout the winter months when cranberries and raisins are popular, this pie wins their unqualified approval—as it will yours—with its delicious flavor and succulent Christmas "plums."

Rosemary Lane (First printing. Number of requests 367.) She was born in Indianola, Iowa, on April 4, 1916 and her name was Rosemary Mullican. She attended high school there and then went to Simpson College. In college, she appeared in a variety of operettas and plays and displayed a very definite talent. She studied voice and piano with an eye to becoming a concert pianist. She was a Pi Beta Phi and belonged to the National Scholastic Society, but doesn't look the part at all. In fact, she was the original Betty Co-Ed with every boy in college begging for dates. Rosemary, however, wasn't the only pretty and talented girl in the Mullican family. She had three sisters, Leota, Lola and Priscilla. Leota and Lola were the first to launch themselves on a theatrical career and while Priscilla was in New York studying dramatics, Rosemary and her mother paid her a visit. One day the girls stopped in a music publisher's to buy some of the newest songs and while they were running over the music a man passed by who was so impressed with their voices that he introduced himself. The man was Fred Waring and he gave them both jobs with his Pennsylvanians. With Waring's orchestra, Rosemary and Priscilla had plenty of radio work and stage appearances and then came a picture offer from Hollywood. "Varsity Show" was the result. Rosemary's beauty and talent pictured as well as it got over on the stage and radio and she was signed by Warners.

Lee Bowman (First printing. Number of requests, 325). Lee Bowman really intended to become an attorney and if it hadn't been for his brother-in-law, who was head of the little theatre movement in Omaha, Neb., he probably would have. Born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on December 28, his childhood and early youth was about the same as any average boy's. After graduating from high school he took a three-year prelegal course at the University of Cincinnati. During this period, his brother-in-law, Bernard Szold, stepped in and induced him to leave school and join a stock company in Omaha. He played several roles with telling success and again, on his relative's advice, went to New York and took a two years' course at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts. Following this, he joined a stock company in Jaffray, New Hampshire and from that graduated to a role in the New York production of "Berkeley Square." In that play a Paramount talent scout discovered him. A test followed and a contract was the result. Bowman has sung on the radio and can go into a mean buck-and-wing without batting an eyelash.

NELSON EDDY

Dear Information Desk:

Just by way of thanking you, may I say how much I appreciate the Barometer standing your readers have accorded me!

I feel honored that they should take time to send in votes for me and feel also that your Barometer is an accurate gauge of public opinion where a star is concerned. You know how chief a concern it is for a player to please the public, and when he can know for a certainty just how he stands it is a fine thing indeed. The fact that the Barometer compiles a six months' record inspires confidence in its authenticity. Because of this, I am all the more grateful to the fans who have been so generous.

With best wishes for your continued success,

Very sincerely yours,

Nelson Eddy

Due to a misunderstanding which seems to be confusing a great number of Information Desk followers, we are taking this opportunity to again explain the system by which our Barometer figures are compiled. A star's position on the Barometer is determined according to the number of votes he or she receives over a period of six months. Thus, if Errol Flynn were to receive three thousand votes from April through September, that would be the number of votes to appear on the Barometer for that six months' period. However, when October's votes are tabulated, the month of April is deducted from the original three thousand and October's total added, in order to keep the number of months still limited to six. It is possible that the number of votes Flynn received in April might have far exceeded the number received in October. Thus, his grand total in October would be less than his grand total in September. One month is always deducted for each new month added. Therefore, though a star's rating may seem incorrect, it is actually a perfectly authentic count of the votes sent for a perpetual period of six months.

Eight Movie Fans, Newark, N. J. Anything to oblige. Claire Trevor is five feet three inches tall and isn't married. Igor Gorin is Russian. Frankie Darro just acts that way because of the parts he gets; he's not really tough at all. And neither is he Judy Garland's boy friend. Mickey Rooney is the lucky lad. Humphrey Bogart was married but has recently been divorced from Mary Phillips. As for the song you're interested in, why not try your favorite music store?

Sarah Percosky, Brooklyn, N. Y. It's no easy matter to break into the movies and you certainly won't find talent scouts wandering around Brooklyn. Why not try your luck on some amateur radio program and see how far your talent takes you? If you are outstanding, you will achieve recognition and, if not, better give up the idea of pictures.

Erna Wilde, Chicago, Ill. To obtain photographs of the stars write to the studio where they are under contract and enclose twenty-five cents to cover mailing cost. Janet Gaynor may be reached at United Artists, Hollywood, Calif. Margaret Lindsay, Errol Flynn and Anita Louise should be addressed, Warner Brothers, Burbank, Calif., Don Ameche and Tyrone Power, at 20th Century-Fox, Hollywood, Calif., and Clark Gable, Bill Powell, Luise Rainer, Jimmy Stewart and Robert Taylor at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, Calif.

Laurence Mayer, Woonsocket, R. I. Life stories of favorite stars appear each month in this department of MODERN SCREEN. The Mauch twins' biography can be found on page seventy-four of the November issue. This also answers Frances Lampert.

Dorothy Bachelder, Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Mickey Rooney is fifteen years old, Deanna Durbin fourteen, Judy Garland, thirteen and Jackie Cooper is a young man of sixteen.

Iva Kraus, Ellwood City, Penna. Pat O'Brien's pet hobby is buying loud neckties for himself. When his friends josh him he pretends whatever dizzy neckpiece he may be wearing at the time is a present from his wife! Simone Simon's latest picture is "Love And Hisses."

Arlene Darrow, Cleveland, Ohio: If you will send a self-addressed, stamped envelope, your questions will be answered since they are too long to appear in this column.

Floyd Smith, Lockport, N. Y. We are glad to be able to set you straight on this Barometer business and hope that our reply to you will answer a lot of other similar questions. First: One person may send in all the requests he wishes and they need not be written on a coupon. Each separate request, of course, counts as a new vote for the favored star. Now, as to our free-picture offer. We did have such an offer some months ago, awarding a picture to the person sending in the most requests for some star, but the idea has proved highly impractical and has since been discontinued.

Mrs. Stella Borders, Portsmouth, Ohio: Yes, Robert Taylor did appear in a picture with the late Will Rogers. The title was "Handy Andy," and it was released in 1934.

Out on the "Bringing Up Baby" set, "Baby" is a long, lean leopard, not Katharine Hepburn. Baby was rented from Olga, famous animal trainer here in town—but it isn't Olga who keeps Baby so docile. It's the fact that everyone in the cast is doused with perfume. For the leopard is a push-over for French perfume, preferring "Evening In Paris" above everything else. Once having sniffed this on one of the players, Baby is his friend. Funniest thing we've ever seen is the husky director, Cary Grant and Charlie Ruggles spraying themselves with a large atomizer of perfume before going into a scene with Baby.

Most uninteresting item of the month: Jeanette MacDonald's press agent, wilting under sustained cross-examination, reveals Jeanette's favorite swear words. They are, "Oh, flibbergibble;" and "Oh, shuttlebob!" We merely report this in the hope that Miss MacDonald will read it and blush. We've seen her on the set when, on more than one accasion, she shouted out a few good lady-like damns. And we don't give a flibbergibble who knows it!

What is this thing called Love? Tyrone Power kisses Janet Gaynor a fond goodbye and she sets forth for New York firmly believing she is the girl in his life. Next day Sonja Henie arrives in Hollywood, and Mr. P. is on hand to kiss her a fond hello. And Loretta Young, who gave up Director Eddie Sutherland for Tyrone, now goes with Producer Joe Mankiewicz, who probably doesn't give a shuttlebob about the whole situation.

Very fancy situation out at Universal. With "100 Men and a Girl" practically saving the studio from bankruptcy, orders came through to rush another Deanna Durbin picture into production. Writers went to work furiously on "Mad About Music," while the Wall Street bankers held the purse strings. To add to the situation, Deanna was growing taller almost daily, and Universal executives were growing correspondingly balder. As we go to press, the script has just been finished, Deanna is just on the verge of blossoming into young womanhood, and the bankers in Wall Street are coughing nervously.

Over at RKO they're fuming over a rotund comedian who has cost the studio over $100,000 on one production. His habit of forgetting to show up for work got very annoying, especially on days when several hundred extras had been assembled for scenes. The gal star of the picture, who was once very friendly with the guy, now treats him with icy silence. The other day the errant thespian topped everything when, after a gay night, he showed up right on time for work—but at the wrong studio.

Mae West, whose popularity is on the wane, invited the press to a huge cocktail party on one of the sets of her new picture, "Every Day's a Holiday." It was Mae's first party to the press, a nice social gesture as well as a chance to coax a few lines in the public prints. Affair started at five, and it wasn't till six that Mae made her grand entrance. With a regal smile she seated herself at the honor table, and George Rector made crepe suzettes on a chafing

You probably never thought of Spencer Tracy as a male fashion plate, but wait until you see him in "Mannequin." In a fashion show scene, Mr. T. appears in cutaway, striped pants and ascot tie. The costume wasn't by Adrian, but it could have been. Spencer took plenty of kidding on his sartorial elegance from cast and crew. Just to show you what a spineless guy he is, he was afraid to wear his costume to the commissary for lunch. Each noon hour he rushed to his dressing-room and put on an old suit before appearing in the lunch room.

Well, they settled the big Bartholomew-M-G-M feud. Freddie claimed he couldn't pay his way through grammar school on the paltry thousand-a-week they had been paying him, and Metro told Freddie they made much less than that themselves when they were a boy. But now Freddie is back at the studio, at $2,000 per week, and everybody is happy. Except young Douglas Scott, whose accent is just as British as Freddie's, and who would have had Freddie's job had the feud continued.

In a studio projection room the other day, we looked at several scenes from "The Goldwyn Follies," on which Mr. G. is spending some two million dollars. One of them was a ballet number. We don't know how you'll like ballet, but we're positive you're going to like the dancer, Zorina. She's one of the most gorgeous creatures we've ever seen on the screen, so keep an eye out for her. We also saw a scene with Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy. McCarthy is funny, but we predict he won't be as popular on the screen as he is on the air. If we're wrong, pretend you didn't read it here.

Surprise! Bette Davis doesn't seem to know what to do about that lei someone gave her at the Club Waikiki opening. That's Lloyd Nolan on her right, listening very intently.

One of the nicest young ladies either on or off the screen is Virginia Bruce (unpd. advt.). We spent a pleasant half hour recently in her dressing-room on the "Bad Man of Brimstone" set, discussing this and that and taking in the scenery. The scenery, of course, is Miss B. herself. She never wears make-up on the screen, and we tried to pry loose a few beauty secrets. Unfortunately, it seems, there ain't no secrets. The little lady just happens to be beautiful, which is a dandy trick if you can do it.

A LADY IN LOVE

BY NANETTE KUTNER

And as such Luise Rainer should be exuberantly happy! But is she? That question is answered in her own inimitable manner

THIS IS a story nobody knows. Neither her studio, nor its press department, nor the dozens of reporters who unsuccessfully tried to reach her. It is the story of Luise Rainer's strange vacation.

They knew she was in the East. Someone had seen her at the opening of "Dead End." Someone else glimpsed her in Connecticut. Those reporters who went down to the end of Fifth Avenue, to the beginning of Greenwich Village, to the Clifford Odets' penthouse, faced a sign neatly typed on a square of paper tacked to the door. It was a warning, a printed slap-in-the-face, brief, explicit, rude. "Unless the visitor has been announced from the desk downstairs the bell will not be answered." And that was that. Here is the reason why.

"They think I am not coöperating," Luise Rainer protested, to me—ace tracker-downer—as she paced up and down the wide living-room floor, tossed her black hair, gesticulated with both hands, spoke in her characteristic way—with all of herself.

"No! I was not giving interviews, having my picture taken, buying clothes on Fifth Avenue and running to night clubs. But I was coöperating just the same, coöperating by learning to be a better actress!"

"So you won't rest on that Academy Award laurel," I commented. "But what were you learning? What were you doing?"

For answer she led me out onto the terrace. "Look!" she exclaimed. "Your New York." And we stared down to the East River, to the Hudson, to the compact little streets and the skyscrapers surrounding us.

"Look!" she repeated. "I have just a few very precious weeks. I come here from Hollywood for a breath of air, for a breath of humanity, for life itself. I breathe it in, then I go back. Hollywood is like living in a tower away from reality, nothing is real there. Here it is so different, so wonderful!"

Again the speaking in superlatives, the pacing up and down, the waving of the hands, this time both arms opened wide as if to embrace the whole sky.

"You know what I did on this vacation? You know what I saw? Come, I'll tell you."

Quickly she dusted two deck chairs. "We sit here like this. Now, listen. One week I wear a white uniform like a nurse. I comb my hair back under a cap. I scrub off my make-up. And I persuade a doctor friend of mine to take me to the city hospitals. There I work. I don't go in like a star, with my arms full of flowers, my face full of smiles. No, I go and turn pillows and wash faces and smooth blankets and hold hands. They do not know who I am. But I see things—life, suffering. I see babies whose mothers were too poor to have them. I see little children, undernourished, sick. I ask where they go when they leave the hospital. They must go back, I am told, to the tenements.

"There was one little boy I cannot forget. He had tumor on the brain. I watched the operation. Afterwards he tried to tear off the bandages. He was so sick. Yet he must return to the dirt, the poverty, the drabness, the bad air. But right outside those hospital windows is the East River, and I look and see the yachts of the millionaires. And it makes me sick."

Luise Rainer and her playwright hubby, Clifford Odets, lunching. Mr. O. seems to influence wifey, Luise, despite her protestations to the contrary, for while in New York City she chose to rub elbows with the sort of people he writes about.

Luise says, "I'd rather play the part of a slavey in one of those Russian pictures than star in something that is a waste of time."

Obviously afraid I might think she shares her husband's radical opinions, Miss Rainer hastily interrupted herself. "I am not interested in politics. I am interested in people. I want to be like them, to understand their troubles, to play to them, not to the yachting ones, who are not real, who are like Hollywood. I want the people to see me and say, 'You're one of us.' I want to take from them their mannerisms, their troubles, the atmosphere in which they live. I want to breathe it all in and give it back a hundred times!

"I went to the public library. I wore an old suit and eyeglasses. I sat and talked to the lonely people there, the city people who had nothing to do, no place to go, nobody with whom they could talk, except perhaps, the doorman. In the library I realized how great America is. One can come to it, and read and learn all for nothing. It is so well organized. In no other country in the world do you find it like this.

"I went to a labor meeting. And I visited the office where the German refugees are sent. I listened to their stories. I tried to put myself in their places, arriving in a strange land, having to speak a new language, leaving everything they love behind them, and no way to earn a living."

She sighed, then smiled as another memory flashed across that quick mind of hers. "I went to the Metropolitan Museum. There I saw too much beauty. It chokes me, so much at the same time. And I made myself only look at one thing—at the Grecian marbles, the sculpture. I wanted to carry that memory back to Holly- (Continued on page 67)

ROBIN HOOD THROWS

He calls her Damita and she calls him Fleen, which is just another way of presenting Mr. and Mrs. Errol Flynn.

Plenty of gals will sigh with envy over Joan Blondell when they see her teamed with Flynn in "The Perfect Specimen."

I ARRIVED at Errol Flynn's house at five o'clock to get a story from him. Mr. Flynn is a delightful host. His first thought is for your comfort. "Wouldn't you like to sit out on the terrace? Cigarettes? A glass of sherry, perhaps? Oh yes, we've got a story to do, haven't we? Well, here comes Sheffield with the sherry. Maybe that will inspire us."

Sheffield is the Flynn butler, bespectacled, grave, correct. "A gift direct from P. G. Wodehouse to us," Errol murmurs, as Sheffield's straight back vanishes into the house.

Arno gambols up and lays his gray head on Flynn's knee. Arno is the Schnauzer who once broke his leg on location. Flynn saved his life, by traveling three hundred miles through the night to have the leg set. Involuntarily, your hand goes out to stroke him. His master beams.

"You like dogs? Come on over and see the lion pups." He leads you to a far corner of the garden, where two animals, for whom the term pup seems a misnomer, rise to greet you, forepaws on the wire netting, heads overtopping yours. Flynn introduces them. "Mr. and Mrs." He turns a bland eye on you.

"Oh, but you didn't come out to admire animals. You came for a story. Right." With the utmost good will, he takes you back to the terrace and gets you settled again. He gets himself settled. He drops his hands between his long legs and leans forward, a good child, completely at your disposal. Sheffield appears at the door. "Mr. Ernst calling."

Flynn jumps up, relief written all over his face. "Terribly sorry. Will you excuse me? I'll be right back." When he does come back, he's grinning from ear to ear. He draws a hand over his face to wipe off the grin, and tries, with meager success, to look penitent. "That was Bud Ernst. He always has this effect on me. Peculiar sense of humor. Can't expect you to appreciate the joke, being kept waiting like this. But see here. Maybe I can make up by telling you about the birthday party he gave me." He looks hopeful. "Maybe you could sort of stretch it out, and presto, there's your story!

"Well, I was here all alone. Lili was abroad. Bud called up one morning and said he was giving me a birthday party that night. Up to that moment I'd forgotten that it was my birthday, and been perfectly happy in my ignorance. After he called, I began waxing sentimental, lonely, neglected orphan and all that sort of thing, one true pal in the world, who remembered my birthday. By the time we went out to dinner, I was in a fine glow. Presently, as we sat there, six telegraph boys marched in, the glummest looking sourpusses you ever set eyes on. He must have hand-picked them for hyperacidity or something. They surrounded me, serenaded me with 'Happy Birthday to you' and marched out again, never having cracked a muscle. I began to wonder. Then in came a magnificent birthday cake, 'Happy Birthday' across the top and all the rest of it. I was so touched I could hardly talk.

"'D'you like it?' Bud asked.

"'I love it,' I told him, almost choking with emotion.

"'That's fine,' said Ernst, and called the waiter. 'Take it away. That's for Frank Morgan's birthday tomorrow. I just rented it.'" As he got to the payoff, Flynn threw back his head and roared with laughter. Sheffield puts in a third appearance at the door. "The guests have arrived, Mr. Flynn," he announces.

You have only time to throw him a look of dismay. "I thought we'd be through by now," he apologizes. "Stick around. Maybe you can get the story between takes. Hello, Sailor."

A SHORT, thick-set man, with a genial face, stands beside Sheffield and makes a low comedy bow. Enter Flynn's Musclemen, otherwise known as the "Body Beautifuls." From the house into the garden, they emerge by twos and threes until there are twenty-five in all, groups of bearded men, fresh from the day's work, in high good humor at the prospect of entertainment. All day they've been wrestling, sparring, learning how to handle swords, cudgels, bows and arrows, in preparation for their jobs as Robin Hood's merry men. Some, who worked with him in "Captain Blood," Flynn knows. Others he's meeting for the first time.

ANITA ASTONISHES!

BY FAITH SERVICE

I TOOK one good look at Anita Louise and then, to paraphrase a popular song, my preconceived ideas stood still! I had expected her to be, to speak honestly, a sort of composite Elsie Dinsmore, Pollyanna and Elaine, the Lily Maid.

In other words, I went to lunch with Anita Louise anticipating, not too eagerly, an hour with a flawlessly beautiful girl, after which I would go home again, not sadder but certainly not wiser.

From the instant Anita Louise joined me at table, from the first strong clasp of her hand, from the first stimulating, alive tone of her voice, my preconceived ideas folded up their little gossamer wings and did flip flops all over the place.

There is a stern quality to her beauty, a forthright, debunking, pungent quality to her mind which would have thrown Elsie Dinsmore into such jitters as even Elsie never could have conceived. And there is a sense of humor which includes even herself and her own problems.

The beauty, of course, cannot be gainsaid. But her intelligence, her vitality and maturity, give to that beauty a character, a compelling power, an intellectual promise which is not, I must admit, the kind of beauty I had expected. Five minutes after we began to talk I forgot how beautiful she is, because her beauty becomes a secondary matter. I said, on a sudden thought, "Your greatest problem must be your beauty."

"It is," she replied, agreeing with me as matter-of-factly, as honestly as though I had said, "that wall eye of yours must be quite a drawback."

Because she is honest. She is completely without coyness. I emphasize that, because a beauty without coyness is a lovely thing indeed. And rare. And it would have been coy of her to simper, to try to pretend that she is blind, can't see herself in the mirror.

I told Anita then, how I'd thought of her as a sort of composite Pollyanna, Elsie Dinsmore and Elaine, the Lily Maid. She laughed, her strong, clear laughter. She said, "The lovely Elaine must have been very lovely, so thanks for that, anyway. But she died before she had the chance to grow up. I didn't, you see."

"She died for love, too," I mused. "Would you?"

"Well, I doubt it," Anita laughed again. "I'm sorry to offend the poets, but I doubt it.

"It is perfectly true, however, that beauty can be, often is, a curse in this profession. Curious paradox, isn't it, when you might suppose that in a pictorial medium, pictorial qualities would be aces in the deck. But they're not. I know that when I talk sensibly, practically, even intelligently, to a producer or a director, they look at me as though they are thinking I should have my temperature taken. I have the horrid fear that they are going to say, 'There, there!' and fob me off with a lollilop or a new dolly.

I'M AFRAID I'm very deceiving, until people know me well. I'm far from being fragile. There is nothing finicky and lace paper valentinish about me, in any way. I adore big, thick steaks and fried potatoes. I never diet. I can, and often do, cook my own meals. I have no beauty secrets except soap and water, and plenty of both, on my face. I do my own nails, usually shampoo my own hair and hang out the window to dry it.

"I'm pretty economical and save my money. I am rather extravagant about clothes, not so much for reasons of personal vanity or indulgence, but because I believe they are necessary overhead in my business. I drive my own car, a Ford. I have one pet, a Scotty named Wee Thistle. I have no hobbies unless you might call my eighty-year-old piano and my two-hundred-year-old violin hobbies. I also have an ancient lute, which I can play. I'm not the languid, chaise-longue type. I play a decent game of tennis, swim, fence, ride.

"I went to the Professional School in New York and then to the Greenwood School for Girls here in Hollywood and took part in most of the school sports. And I'd like to have a part on the screen where I could look as ugly as sin and thus try to demonstrate that I can do something more than simper innocently in the pale moonlight.

"I will say that things are looking up for me. I feel much more hopeful than I did a year or so ago. Hopeful that I am beginning to convince the powers that be that I am grown up, know the facts of life, have red blood in my veins and even a muscle or two. I have the hope that I can soon say goodbye forever to the sugary, vapory, moonlight-and-roses sweet young things, like the candy Miss I did in "First Lady." She (Continued on page 74)

She's blonde, she's beautiful—but dumb? Meet luscious Louise

The gods were in a generous mood when they bestowed their blessings on Anita, for not only is she lovely to look at, she's smart as well! A veteran picture star at the ripe old age of twenty, she's set for bigger and better roles from now on.

Meet the gent who causes a stampede every time he ventures out in public. And fifty million women can't be wrong. This Boyer's got what it takes!

BOYER TELLS ON HIMSELF

In "Tovarich," Boyer scores again. He's shown here in a tense moment with Claudette Colbert. They make a snappy-looking couple, what?

Mr. and Mrs. Boyer, in an affectionate pose. The little woman is Pat Paterson, who has quite a fan-following of her own.

Mr. B., playing truth, tells why women are mad for him, and men, mad at him—and why he's big enough to take it!

BY GLADYS HALL

I CAME out of Grauman's Chinese Theatre here in Hollywood the other night after a preview. Stars blocked the way of lesser mortals, and as I waited for my car, there occurred a stampede. A strange monster seemed to be crawling away from the awninged entrance. It might have been a bee-hive in slow motion.

Standing on tip-toe, I managed to make out that the monster was Charles Boyer's car. In the car was Mr. Boyer. On the running boards, swarming over the roof, crowding the chauffeur from his seat, were women, girls, all sizes, ages, types, from red-lipped girls in their terrible teens to respectable matrons in their furious forties. They were, indeed, swarming like bees. And it wasn't even his preview. Something like a roar was going up from the composite throat of the fevered fans. One could make out that they were shouting, "Boyer! Boyer!"

A glimpse of Boyer's face showed that he was impressed. For the smile he was wearing was almost fatherly, very kind, grateful for their interest, slightly amused. It was a smile totally devoid of the smug look of the matinee idol who considers that he is getting no more than his just due.

This was not a new experience to anyone who has attended premieres, previews, stars' parties, stars' weddings, stars' funerals. Still, there did seem to be something extraordinarily rabid about this crowd which besieged Boyer. How does he take it? Has he become conceited about it? I wondered.

A few days later, Mr. Boyer received me in his portable dressing-room on the set of "Tovarich." He apologized because we had to talk there. He regretted that we could not have met at his home, had luncheon, cocktails. The dressing-room was so small, uncomfortable. He was so sorry. He was trying so hard to finish in "Tovarich," he went on. He was still making some retakes for "Conquest." He was eager to get away to join his wife who was then awaiting him in Paris.

In the adjoining portable, Claudette Colbert, who plays Boyer's wife, the role Marta Abba created in New York, was having her feet massaged. The soles of her feet. I know because I peeked. Claudette called out, "Hulloa! This is what comes of following in the footsteps of others. I've never done a picture before from a successful stage play. It's sort of frightening. Comparisons will be made. Very hard on the feet, or maybe it's just because I should wear orthopedic shoes, (Continued on page 76)

Ginger was indeed a distracted hostess one Christmas and, while her guests were amused, she was not. You probably wouldn't be either.

Warner Baxter, on the other hand, recalls a Yuletide that brought him his first real happiness after many years of heartbreak.

A XMAS THEY'LL NEVER FORGET

By DORA ALBERT

WHAT Christmas Day in your life stands out above all the others? Was it a Christmas when you were forlorn and in need, was it a glorious, joyful Christmas when, after a long absence, you were reunited with your family, or was it a Christmas when death's icy fingers clutched at someone you loved? Whatever memory stands out in your mind, there is probably some star who can match your experience.

The Christmas Warner Baxter will always remember occurred three years ago. Ever since he had begun to be successful in pictures, Warner had dreamed of the time when he would be able to build a house just exactly as he and his wife wanted it, and he had planned to have it done by Christmas, 1934. He told his wife and his mother that they would have dinner in their new home.

When he learned that the house couldn't possibly be completed by Christmas, he was heartbroken. Then he decided that regardless of whether the house was ready, they'd have their first dinner there that Christmas.

Though several rooms in the house hadn't been finished, and though there was no electricity, he saw to it that a huge fireplace was installed in the recreation room and that the kitchen was ready.

His mother, his wife and a few close friends were his guests at that dinner. He not only prepared the turkey, the cranberry sauce, the mince pie and sweet potatoes, but he also set a table before the roaring fireplace, lit the room with candles and served the meal himself.

With the candles burning brightly like gay promises for the future, Christmas came to that hearthside even more surely than if the house of dreams had been completed. For the guests relaxed, the informality of the occasion pleased them, and as Warner Baxter's eyes met those of his wife, a look of understanding flashed between them. Long ago, when Warner was a poor, struggling actor and they lived in cheap boarding-houses, where ugly designs made a monotonous pattern upon the wall, they had dreamed of a day like this.

"This was the happiest and most peaceful day of my life," Warner Baxter said. "I had my family around me. I had the home I had always dreamed of. I was happy in my work. What more could any man ask?"

Clark Gable's most significant Yuletide took place when he was only seven. It was Clark Gable was only seven when he suffered his first big disillusionment, and no Christmas has been the same since.

Olivia De Havilland's most thrilling December 25th was a very puzzling one. She still gets a chuckle when she thinks of it.

There is a star who can match your most memorable Yuletide experience, be it happy or sad then that he suffered his first big disillusionment.

Ever since he could remember, Santa Claus had been very real to him, and for days before Christmas he couldn't sleep, waiting for Santa Claus's visit.

Then came that eventful morning. He was prating on to their nextdoor neighbor about Santa's visit and what he expected Santa to bring him.

Not realizing how cruel he was being, the neighbor laughed at him. "I'm surprised that a big boy like you should actually believe in Santa Claus," he said. "There's no such person. It's just your parents who leave gifts for you."

When Clark, bewildered, came to his father, he could do nothing but admit the truth of their neighbor's statement.

"No Christmas was ever quite the same after that," Clark said.

There's one Christmas Ginger Rogers will always remember. It should have been a joyful one, for her mother had planned a party and dinner for eighteen people.

A few hours before the party, Mrs. Rogers became very sick. But she begged Ginger not to call it off, because she didn't want to disappoint so many people. When the guests arrived, Ginger tried to do her best, but the results were chaotic. As Ginger had been working hard at the studio, her mother had planned everything; Ginger might as well have been a guest, for all she knew of her plans. Mrs. Rogers was too sick to discuss any of the details of the party.

Worried about her mother, Ginger forgot to set up the place cards, and the guests had to scramble into whatever seats they could find. The flustered maid skipped one whole course and then served it after the coffee and dessert.

Ginger knew that a whole series of games with carefully selected prizes had been planned, but she didn't know what the games were. Desperately, she organized impromptu entertainment, but she couldn't find the prizes. She still has some of them, unearthed after her mother's recovery. The gifts for the guests were hopelessly mixed up with hilarious results. (One fragile blonde got a humidor.)

The entire time Ginger had to pretend to be happy and to enter into the spirit of the festivities, she was worried about her mother. Every few minutes she would rush frantically upstairs to see how she was feeling.

In a way, the party was a tremendous success, for the efforts of the distracted hostess were regarded as screamingly funny. But to Ginger Rogers, the whole thing was a ghastly nightmare.

Never will Ann Sothern forget one horrible holiday season before she entered pictures, when she was touring to join a road show in a small Nebraska town. Christmas Eve was spent on the train, absolutely alone, homesick and miserable.

She had never been in this particular town before and she didn't know a soul there, not even the members of her company.

On December 25th she fled from her cold hotel room and walked through the streets, peering in windows at the colorful Christmas trees, actually jealous of the happy, laughing groups on the streets. She had dinner alone in a small restaurant, where she refused to order the Christmas dinner (Continued on page 65)

Brian Donlevy knows that the way to get fans is to get the gal in the last reel! Above, with Tyrone Power and Alice Faye in "In Old Chicago."

Brian wants to be a good guy, but the movie moguls say "No"

MISCASTING THE MENACE

BY ROBERT McILWAINE

WHEN HEADACHES are in order for the men who solve picture problems, one of the biggest of the lot comes while casting "the menace" for those thousands of feet of celluloid and sound that go into the making of a movie.

It seems that most actors assigned to play the "heavy" feel that they are being grossly miscast. You see, while no man is a hero to his valet, every man is a hero in his heart. Also, an actor wants audience approbation, which will enable him to build up a following. The way to get fans is to get the gal in the last reel. If you don't win her, you don't read fan letters. You simply pass up the thrill of seeing, "Dear Mr. Glutz: You're so-oo won—der—ful!!"

Heading the list of that gentry who is lately foregoing a personal following, is Brian Donlevy. Not liking this one bit better than we, who sit in the theatre and, for forty cents, hiss the heck out of him as he kicks our favorite in the face, is this same Brian Donlevy. However, there was a time when things were happier and Mr. D. is prompt to recall them.

"You know, I came to Hollywood via the stage," he reminisced. "On Broadway, I played nice guys and was completely content in my work. Then, after some years, I landed the role in the type play that I had waited for. Perhaps you remember 'Three Cornered Moon'? After I did that, the movies came along and made such tempting offers that I accepted. Had I foreseen my fate as a 'menace' I'm afraid that wild horses couldn't have dragged me west of Hoboken."

Little do any of us realize what is in store for us and, least of all, Brian, for even as you read this, he is making "He Was Her Man" in London with Gracie Fields and Victor McLaglen. On his departure abroad, Donlevy didn't know whether he was still to be the menace or if he would get a break and a little sympathy for a change. With such a heavy hero as McLaglen, even a miscast menace must seem endowed with a few of the minor virtues.

But seriously, Mr. Donlevy likes pictures. He also likes acting in them. Besides this, he enjoys getting fan mail—lots of it. He realizes that it is one of the barometers which gauge a player's success. He used to get plenty of it; that is, until the Powers That Be insisted upon casting him as the meanest guy that ever came down the picture pike. Since he's been cinematically forced to beat the daylights out of a gent who's not only down, but also out, he has noticed a great falling off in his mail. It scares him. The public somehow fails to differentiate between the player and the role he is playing.

"Look at Lionel Stander," points out the worried Brian sorrowfully. "Since he played that skunky press agent in 'A Star is Born,' the poor fellow hasn't worked a day. And the scene that really did it was one he was called back to the studio to make, after (Continued on page 71)

BY JAMES REID

Ann Sothern and Hubby Roger Pryor have been apart so much that she sometimes wonders if he was even there for the wedding! But she keeps her chin up, does Annie, and looks forward to the day when things will be different.

BACHELOR BRIDE

Ann lives alone and loathes it. But she's got plans for the future!

I'LL SAY that the first year of married life is the hardest!"

Ann Sothern smiles, but her smile is a grimace of rebellion. From a large framed photograph across the room, Roger Pryor seems to be smiling approval. "No marriage ever had such a hectic first year as ours had.

"Roger and I went together for four years. During all that time, neither of us could see anyone else, figuratively speaking. Now, speaking literally, we can't see each other, except at brief intervals over periods of weeks, and then only after long airplane hops.

"Things started to be hectic the day we decided on marriage. I had a month's vacation ahead of me. And I was going to Chicago to make personal appearances. Roger and his orchestra were about to open at the College Inn in Chicago. But, before he opened, he had six days to spare. He flew out to see me.

"As he stepped off the plane, he said, 'Will you marry me?' I said, 'But this so sudden, after four years. I'll have to have time to think it over.'

"That was a Tuesday. Bright and early the next morning, we went down to see about a license. California makes you wait three days to get married. And it seems that the day you register doesn't count as one of the three. The clerk said we couldn't pick up our license Saturday. But we both had to be in Chicago Monday morning.

"I had always dreamed that I'd have a church wedding, be able to dress up, and look, and feel, like a bride. I wasn't going back on that dream now. We finally persuaded the clerk to make an exception, just this once, and let us have our license on Saturday, on our solemn promise not to use it Saturday. It took some doing to arrange a wedding between Saturday midnight and plane time. Especially a church wedding. But I had one, and I had a wedding gown. We were married at twelve-one Sunday morning.

"We had a three-week honeymoon. And, during that time, when I wasn't working, Roger was. Fine idea I had had, signing for those personal appearances to be near Roger! He closed at the Inn at three a. m. And at seven a. m. I had to start my day."

At the end of three weeks the personal appearances were over, but so was the chance for even a daily glimpse of each other. RKO-Radio summoned Mrs. Roger Pryor back to Hollywood to be Ann Sothern for a new picture.

She couldn't get east for Christmas, Roger couldn't get west. Both were chained to their work. And when each tried to telephone the other on Christmas Eve, the wires were so clogged with other long-distance calls that it was six a. m., December 25th, before one of them could get a call through. And by that time they were so worn out with waiting that they forgot half of what they had intended to say.

Walk if he can ride? Not clever Warren William! He'll just invent something

Warren works so hard inventing ways to save himself work that he can't find time to relax any more. Ideas come so fast, he can't even sleep nights.

He'd rather tinker than eat. His machine shop is so full of gadgets that it looks like something right out of a mechanic's nightmare. And you should see his bedroom!

THE GADGETEER

I ARRIVED at Warren William's beautiful, rambling, two-and-a-half acre estate in San Fernando Valley to investigate the strange case of Warren William. It has been whispered, confidentially, that he is a gadgeteer! Now, there are racketeers, a'plenty. There are pamphleteers. There are even muleteers. But a gadgeteer is something new. An inventor who specializes in gadgets.

Warren William doesn't invent gadgets to make money, however, but for the sole purpose of saving himself time. He has a philosophy of personal comfort and non-effort. If he can invent a device which will save him the lifting of his little finger that device is invented.

There is something new under the sun, a man with the William profile and the urge of an Edison and he is worth a little research.

Born in Aitkin, Minnesota, the young Warren longed, from childhood, to become a marine engineer. While his father longed, just as earnestly, for Warren to become a newspaper man. The war came along and, perversely, raised the flag of truce between father and son. For Warren went to war and was a soldier. And when the war was ended, reluctant to engage in further family combat, he did not go home at once, but remained in France, joined up with a theatrical troupe touring the army camps and became the white-haired boy of the soldier audiences.

If, Warren felt, he could win the war-crusted, pain-deadened hearts of the soldiers of the Allies, he should be able to win audiences, far more capable of pleasure. He came back to America, stopped off on Broadway, got Richard Dix's role in a road company of "I Love You" and, before very long, a Broadway chance in Rachel Crothers' "Expressing Willie."

So, the truest truth in the character of Warren William is what made an actor of him: his intense dislike of conflict of any kind, effort of any kind. He wants leisure. And a dash of Gandhi non-resistance. It was far easier just to be an actor than to engage with papa in further argument.

It was during his early days on the stage that Alexander Woollcott branded him for years. He wrote of Warren, "He has the Barrymore accent in his speech, and a Barrymore tone in his voice and he looks the very image of the young John Drew who played Petruchio." Thus, even after he came to Hollywood, signed with Warner Brothers, stamped his own image on many screens, the legend of the Barrymore profile stuck to him, took years to shake loose. Now, under long-term contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, one hears no more about it.

AND SO I arrived to beard a gadgeteer among his gadgets. At the gateway to the estate a telephone, on what appeared to be a flexible pulley, dangled within reach of the hand. One had only to call the house and the gates would open automatically, with- (Continued on page 69)

Look out, Mrs. William! The result of this wood-chopping session is apt to be a pair of roller skates for the dog, or something. You never know what Warren's going to think of next.

When this little number is completed, our Warren will be riding to the studio in a dressing-room on wheels, with every modern convenience, including a bar, twin beds and a kitchenette.

The problem of having two screen careers in a family of two won't break up the Gladys George - Leonard Penn marriage. The reason is unusual. Right, as Gladys appears in "Madame X" with John Beal.

WOMAN'S PLACE IS IN THE HEART

Does he really love me? Haven't you ever asked yourself that? Gladys George knows how to find out

GLADYS GEORGE wears her heart on her sleeve. You bump into it, right off. She has none of the customary guile and wile of her sex. She said to her husband, not long ago, "You really love me, don't you? I've got to know." That's Gladys George. The real things she feels in her heart emerge. She did know, of course, but she had to be reassured.

She has none of the smug conceit which would make it unthinkable for the average charming woman to ask a man—let alone a husband—whether or not he loved her.

The average woman would lie like mad rather than let you think for one moment that there could be any doubt about her conquests. But not Gladys George. She has a bluntness which is brave. She doesn't consider that life owes her a living. She doesn't accept love passively, as her just due. She believes that you have to work for a living, give tenderness as well as thought to love.

She said, "Sure, I asked Leonard whether he really loves me, even though I think there are some things better left unsaid. Women talk too much and expect too much. But there are also times when you just have to take a sounding and know just what the depths measure. I'd be no good if I tried to be subtle and clever about my feelings. If I have any dusty little doubts in my mind, I just sweep 'em right out of there by talking about them. You might say that I use the broom of good strong, bristly words. I just ask what I want to know. That's the only way to find out—and, incidentally, my advice to you girls in doubt as to whether or not your beau or husband really loves you. For if a woman knows she is in a man's heart, snug and secure, nothing else matters.

"There has been all kinds of stuff written about whether a woman's place is in the home or out in the world. Most of it has been pretty silly. A woman's place is in the heart of the man she loves! And if she knows that she is in his heart, it doesn't matter a tinker's damn whether she is in the home, in a circus, or in an office."

BY

Gladys continued, "I was jealous. That's why I asked Leonard what I did." It occurred to her that here they were in Hollywood, both with screen careers. (Leonard Penn, you know, has been signed to a long-term contract with M-G-M following his work in "The Firefly.") Two screen careers in one little family of two takes some adjusting. Gladys, then, was jealous. Not of Leonard's career. She is one hundred per cent for that. It was what they both hoped might happen when, after "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie," Gladys was a recognized success in movies. She has not a smither of professional jealousy.

Gladys George believes that you have to give tenderness as well as thought to keep love.

If Leonard's star should rise and her own star, now bright and high, should wane, it would be jake with Gladys.

She said, "I just think that every woman, if she tells the truth, will admit being jealous of other beautiful women. Women who, especially (Continued on page 72)

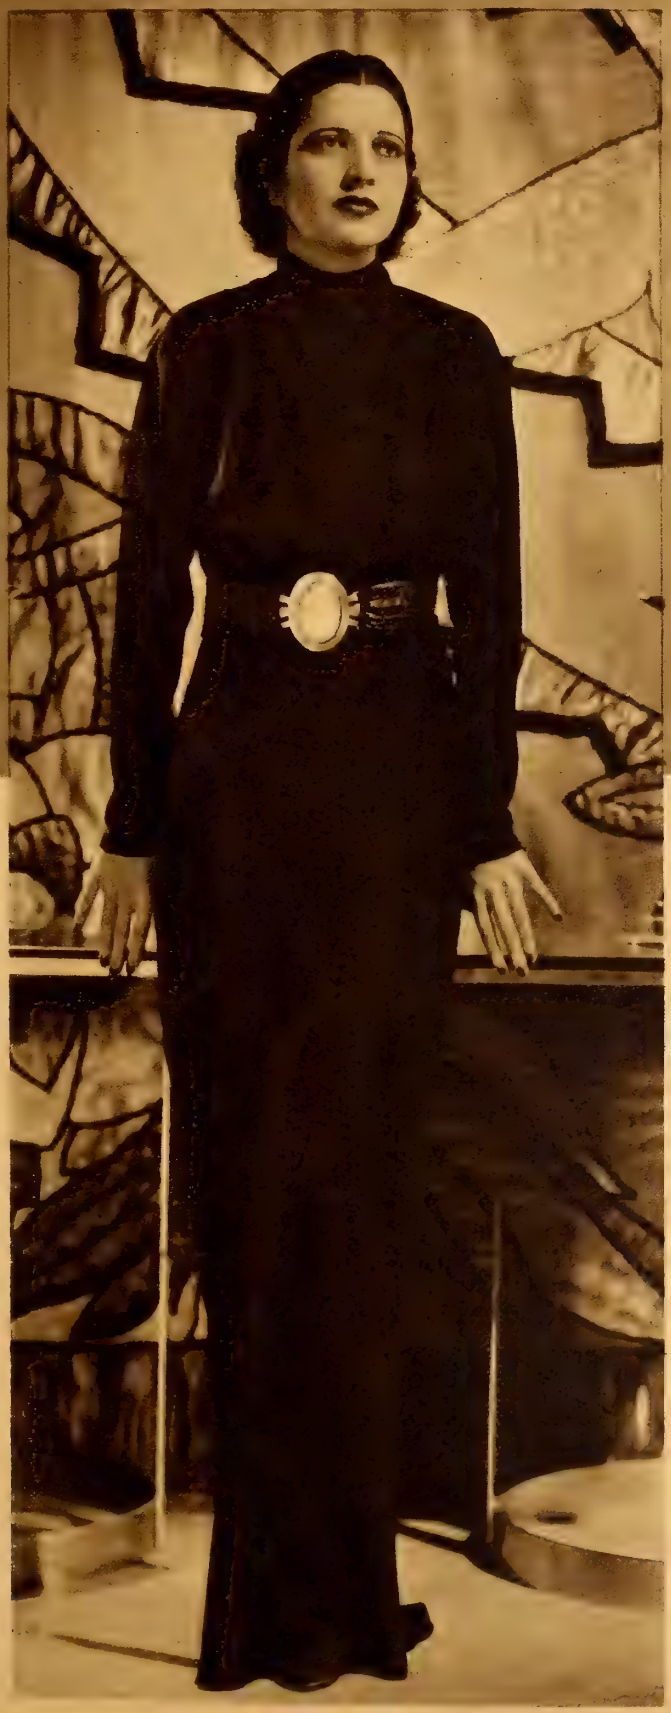
Smoothness is the

Remember Anne Shirley's scene in "Stella Dallas" concerning the artificial flower and the party dress? There was a tip in smoothness.

Carole Lombard has changed from a flashy blonde to a smooth, intriguing woman of the world. What started all this?

TO BE called "smooth"—that's the wistful dream of the modern Miss! Dazzling beauty, ravishing prettiness aren't nearly so desirable. Well, now, that's fine! For the achievement of smoothness is within the power of every girl, every woman. What does it mean, exactly? It has something of the meaning of the French word, soignee—well-groomed, smart, literally well-cared-for. But that doesn't quite cover it, for the word has a special, modern, American meaning all its own. When I hear it, I think of streamline cars, a quickness and aliveness which is typically American, a new sort of subtlety which the American girl is picking up with amazing rapidity.

The word originated, I imagine, on our college campuses, where so many words originate. It is applied to men as well as girls. When a Smith Junior says a Princeton Senior is smooth, she means, in part, that he dresses not too casually and always well, that he's a good dancer, but no professional dancing man, that he can hold his liquor like a gentleman, that he has good manners and, although he may be kinda casual about some things which would have shocked our grandmamas, he never steps over That Certain Line, and that his conversation isn't all wisecracks and amusing nonsense. In other words, the gent has a purpose in life and although he isn't tiresome and stuffy about it, he can be serious on occasion.



When the Princeton Senior says the Smith Junior is smooth, he means that she always looks like a million (and if she's dressing on a skimpy budget, all the more credit to her), and that her make-up is so well done that it doesn't inspire his friends to leer as they leave the grandstand, that her figure, of course, is good, that she has sparkle, zest, pep, that she's feminine to her fingertips and that, while she has her share of sex appeal (or he wouldn't be interested) she's no obvious siren who has the Cosmic Urge on her mind every minute of the time. She dances well, she talks well, she listens better. She's a companion as well as a snappy looking number to parade past the stag line. Which all goes to show what a far distance we've come since the days when the hot mama was the most desirable type of date.

A figure is the first requisite for smoothness. That's obvious. I can't go over the old, old story of sensible diet again, but here are some dietary tips which may be helpful to you. If you're only a little overweight, cut out soft breads, butter, all starchy vegetables and desserts and cream for one month. Note your improvement at the end of that time. Then go back gradually and sensibly to a little butter—half a pat on your green vegetables, a thin scraping of it on whole wheat toast. Go back later, gradually and sensibly, to the other fattening elements and cut them out again as soon as your mirror or the scales tell you that they're doing damage again. Go on the wagon—entirely—for a month.

Then, thereafter, reserve your occasional indulgence for real parties. Don't have a cocktail at luncheon or at five o'clock simply because your friends offer it or because it's around. Occasional party drinking doesn't hurt you nearly as much as one apparently harmless cocktail every afternoon. Married women, don't sit around having that friendly highball or two with the husband when he comes home from work. It's pleasant, I know, but a bad idea for the figure.

Good grooming, charm and poise spell success for the stars—and you

Word for Beauty

Merle Oberon as a slant-eyed siren didn't get far, but as a lady, she's gone places. And Kay Francis (left) is the epitome of smoothness. Why?

If you're a little bit underweight, drink a glass of half milk and half cream every mid-morning or mid-afternoon. Lie down for half an hour after dinner. Occasionally, on evenings spent at home, sip a glass of ale, very slowly, an hour before you go to bed.

As I've said before, we all know good and well what to do to lose and gain weight. The only trouble is in doing it. If someone were only around to tell us! This old stuff about the green vegetables and lean meat and what-not sounds so dreary! True. Therefore, I'm going to include here and now a few diet recipes and ideas—some for the overweight, some for the underweight.

Overweights, did you ever think of going on a meatless diet for a month? Meat's getting so darned expensive anyway that we'll all have to join the vegetarians pretty soon. Eat plenty of vegetables and go in heavily for cabbage, which chases fat. And, say, did you ever eat cabbage soup? You think you wouldn't like it? I think you would. It's very tasty.

Take a head of cabbage, shred it as though for cole slaw, add some carrots (tiny ones whole, if you can get them), some onions cut in small pieces, a little minced garlic, if you care for it, seasoning, a can of tomato juice, two cans of clear beef broth, and let the whole works simmer for about an hour. A beaten egg thickens it and gives it more body, but leave out the egg if you're too, too plump.

Try cold beets with sour cream now and then as a salad —plenty of beets and very little (Continued on page 78)

Fernand Gravet returns to France each year so as not to lose that foreign flavor. You'll be seeing him in "Food for Scandal" with Carole Lombard.

An accent plays a big part in Monsieur Gravet's success, so he's protecting it

FASCINATING FRENCHMAN

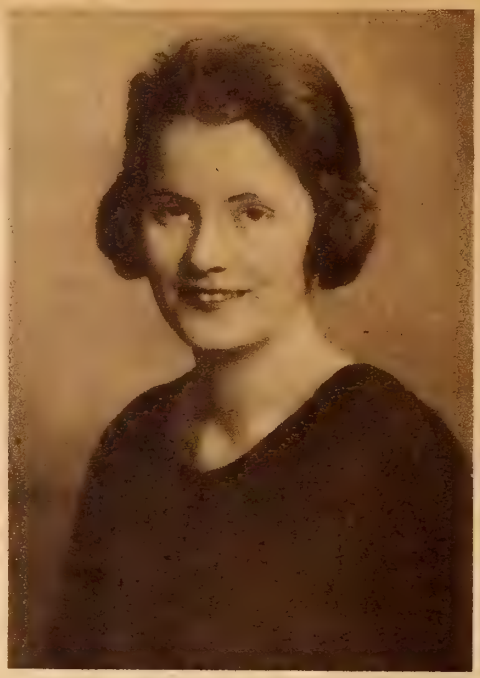
BY MACK HUGHES

FERNAND GRAVET is so proud of his ancestry that he intends to remain French, no matter what! In fact, Gravet absolutely refuses to stay away from his native heath for more than twelve months at a time. Of course, it's easy to understand a man's getting homesick, but can you imagine a Frenchman who fears becoming Americanized to the extent of ducking back at least once a year to inhale a whiff or two of his favorite atmosphere? Not that Fernand doesn't like America, y'understand, but he likes France better, which is perhaps as it should be. And so, he's taking no chance on losing that intriguing accent you heard in "The King and the Chorus Girl."

This fascinating foreigner, by the way, satisfactorily explained the absence of this same accent during the moments he spends away from the camera.

"You see, when the World War broke out, my family happened to be in England," he said. "There we stayed for several years and I was educated in English schools. Naturally, I picked up the Oxford manner of speech. However, we are now back in France and I'm very glad. Not that we weren't happy in England, but, you see, returning to our native land, was like getting back from a long trip."

Speaking of war and its attendant confusion and excitement, Fernand had quite an experience while crossing the country en route to Hollywood recently.



"In Europe, the newspapers don't go so far with this war scare as the American press," explained Gravet. "On my way to California, I got off the train at Kansas City station to buy the papers and, to my amazement, saw startling headlines stating that England and France were about to declare war. Well, I have a mother in France, so naturally I was frightened at the consequences that would result from such a situation. Immediately I telephoned to friends in Paris to find out how much time there was to get my family out of the country. Imagine my surprise when they informed me that it was the first they had heard of any war news!

"I was immensely relieved, of course, and returned to the platform to get my train, (Continued on page 68)

THE TRUE LIFE STORY OF GRETA GARBO
THE TRUE LIFE STORY OF
GRETA GARBO
BY WILLIAM STEWART

Not much allure in evidence, here. Garbo was a schoolgirl when this was taken, too tall for her age and violently self-conscious. She preferred to be alone.

Something of her elusive charm began to show itself by the time Greta was sixteen, when she was a shopgirl who dreamed of being an actress.

The Swedish equivalent of a Mack Sennett Bathing Beauty! Greta Gustafsson got her first screen role in a comedy called "Peter, the Tramp!"

ON THE morning of September 18, 1906, in Stockholm, Sweden, there was born to Sven Gustafsson and his wife, a daughter who was christened Greta Louvisa, because the little mother thought it such a pretty name. The coming of the baby was an additional burden to the already burdened household. Sven Gustafsson was a poor man, alternating meager salaried jobs with timid, unsuccessful ventures into small businesses of his own. The baby, Greta, added another mouth to be fed, another body to be clothed to his little family that already numbered four: the mother, a son, Sven, and a daughter, Alva.

Number 32 Blekingegaten Street on the southside of Stockholm, was a drab house on a drab street in a district surrounded by dingy shops, markets and cheap theatres. The long Swedish winters only added to its bleakness, but it was on its slushy, snow-banked lanes that the young Greta formed her first impressions, toddling after her mother to market, or being pulled on a makeshift sled by her brother or sister.

Greta was a long, thin baby; even in the three or four years of her infancy she exhibited none of that chubbiness so often associated with milk-fed infants in advertisements. And maybe that was due to the noticeable shortage of milk in the Gustafsson household. She was a good baby, slow to learn to walk or talk, but obedient and easily cared for. During the years that her infancy lengthened out into long-legged childhood, nothing happened to her. Greta said about this part of her life: "I do not remember anything of my early childhood. Not even those little first gifts of dolls or colored wagons, which mark the beginning of our memories. Maybe it is because nothing happened to make such an impression." No color. No warmth. Only the drabness of Blekingegaten Street and the monotony of its doings.

At seven she was enrolled in school, the beginning of active unhappiness in her life. She was, by a head, taller than the other children in her class, which gave her the appearance of being older and "backward." Nor did the hand-me-down garments made over from her mother's wardrobe do anything toward dignifying her appearance.

In her immediate family circle however, Greta was always the gay one, the ringleader of the fun. She would regale them with funny stories and act out imitations of characters of the neighborhood with a telling mimicry that kept the little family in gales of laughter. But only with those dear and close to her was it possible for Greta to express herself, a fact which is still very evident in her personality today.

Greta adored her sister. Though Alva was older, she was smaller than Greta Louvisa and the latter constantly referred to her as "my little sister," babying and serving her. It was her chief delight to make up stories for Alva in their bleak, bedroom after they had been put to bed at night. All of the people of Greta's stories were rich and daring and most of them were actresses who played exciting command performances before crowned heads.

At fourteen Greta was as tall as she is today. Sensitiveness, in regard to her height, was almost a fetish with her. Because of it, she grew less inclined to mingle with young people of her own age. Of boys, she was terrified. Self-consciousness retarded her every mood and made her far more awkward than was natural. She grew to dread the walk to her school, darting frightened eyes along the way lest there be someone lurking to titter at her pronounced ungainliness.

They did not like her at school and because of that she uttered a philosophy to which she has clung in her consciousness ever since: "All I want is to be left alone."

Out of aloneness she made up the substance of her early teens. She read a great deal, particularly stories pertaining to actresses and their rôles. Coincidentally, in view of her later ideas, the personal lives of actresses did not interest her at all. The actress was the part, the part, the actress. Only of their glamor did Greta partake, the glory of their art. Perhaps that is why Greta has never understood why people are interested in her own private life, why they are not content just to know her as Garbo, the actress.

In the early Stockholm twilights she loved to slip out

Our Greta is wearing a chic little hat which she designed herself during her modelling days in a Stockholm department store. So fetching did she look that she was often asked to pose for advertising photographs and fashion films.

And here is the "little sister," Alva, whom Garbo so adored, and who died while Greta was in Hollywood seeking American approval. Her passing was one of many personal heartbreaks which came to Garbo during her early years as a film star.

and stand in the shadow of the Southside Theatre, near her home, and watch the actors arrive for the evening performances. Once, while at such an exciting vigil, she caught sight of Lars Hanson and his beautiful wife, Karin Holander, stars of the Royal Dramatic Theatre. Greta knew them immediately from their pictures in the papers. The great Lars! The glorious lady, his wife! Such proximity to greatness almost made her faint. Probably her thin, ungainly form would have completely slipped over had she realized that not so many years in the future this same great Hanson would be supporting her in an American-made picture, "The Divine Woman." On another occasion, she saw Victor Sjeastrom, the great matinee idol, with equally exciting reactions. (Seastrom, as he is known in America, has directed Greta.)

When she was fourteen, still a student in the district school, real tragedy first touched Greta's life. Her adored father died. She grieved so deeply that her thin, pale face grew more wan than ever, and for months the family feared for her health. It was only with the realization that the little family was left without a protector and on its own resources that Greta was able to pull herself together. Something must be done. Someone must do it. Though both her sister and brother were her seniors, Greta seemed to feel the responsibility to be entirely her own. "I am going to work," she said. "There will be no more school."

A Swedish correspondent records the information that Greta took a job as a barber's assistant, her particular task being to lather the faces of the gentlemen patrons with soap, while the barber sharpened and prepared his razors. This was followed by several temporary positions until finally she went to work in the hat department of the Bergstrom Department Store.

Her career began here one day. Greta did not seek out fame at first. It came for her, arriving in the unsuspecting person of the advertising manager. An important person, the advertising manager.

"Bring all the hats and come with me," he instructed, and led her across the street to a photographer's gallery.

Two days later the millinery department was agog with excitement. "Look in the papers! See all the pictures of Greta Gustafsson wearing the hats," one clerk told another. Word went through the store. Clerks, from other departments, drifted by to get a look at her. It seems her pictures, modeling the hats, had been used in a big advertisement featuring the store's millinery. It was Greta Gustafsson's first taste of fame and probably the only welcome one of her entire life, as later events proved.

Glamor begins to definitely creep into the situation in "Gosta Berling," the film which won the plaudits of Europe. Gerda Lundquist is shown with Garbo.

Svengali and his Trilby set sail. In other words, the late Mauritz Stiller brings Garbo to Hollywood, not that Hollywood, in those days, cared a hoot.

THE SIXTEEN-YEAR-OLD Gustafsson girl had to content herself with that first flare of publicity however, for there were no more engagements to pose in the hats. But for the moment, it was sufficient. The little spurt of publicity died down. The business of selling hats went on for a while.

It was not until six months later that one Captain Ring, who made a business of making industrial or advertising films, contracted with the store for a film feature showing some of the new fashions modeled by girls in the store. Greta was called and posed in riding habits and other models, for the film was to be shown in various and sundry Stockholm theatres.

One day the inspired film was thrown on the screen just before the preview of a comedy directed by Eric Petschler, the Mack Sennett of Sweden. "Who is that girl?" asked Petschler. No one knew. "She has personality," he said. Greta Gustafsson so thoroughly impressed Petschler that he looked up Captain Ring through his advertising agency and obtained the name of the tall, blonde, good-looking girl, and her address.

One week later he called at her home, just as Greta arrived from the store, and offered her a chance in a series of bathing girl comedies he was about to put into production.

Greta's first picture was a rowdy, slap-stick affair called "Peter, the Tramp," and it was her part to romp about in the company of several other girls much in the fashion of a Sennett bathing beauty. As an acting part, it was nothing; but so sincere was Petschler's interest in what he termed the girl's unusual personality that he kept her as near the camera as possible, allowing her to share in close-ups with the star. She was getting a real break.

One valuable friendship she made was with Frans Enwall, former instructor at the Stockholm Dramatic Theatre. To him she confided her ambitions, and he, feeling a genuine interest in this frightened but eager young novice, arranged a test for Greta at that theatre. One month before her seventeenth birthday she passed that test.

"I shall never forget that awful agony of going out before them," Greta confided to a friend. "I have always suffered in the presence of strangers, and these strangers held my fate in their hands. I felt ill and weak in the knees. I thought I was going to faint when they called my name and I realized it was my turn to speak the lines I had learned for my test. Only the thought of my mother, sitting at home, tense with anxiety and love for me, made it possible for me to move. In a trance I stepped to the middle of the stage. I heard a voice saying familiar lines. It did not sound like my own. Somehow or other, I finished. But the effort had been too much. Once I was back in the wings, I fainted away."

On your mark, Greta, the gun's about to go off! Garbo was told to pose for this publicity picture!

Greta passed that test immediately, but she did not know this for three days. They were days of agony. She was sure she had failed. Otherwise they would have notified her! Even her family could not reassure her. She spent hours pacing the floor, sipping at cups of steaming coffee, waiting for the word that meant so much. When it finally came, her shattered nerves gave way completely and she cried as though her heart would break.

For two seasons, 1922-1923 and 1923-1924, she was a student in the theatre. She worked hard, putting her whole heart into it.

The shadows were far between in those days, the sunshine abounded at every turn. It burst forth in a flood when Greta was notified that she had been engaged as a student under contract, at a salary of forty dollars monthly.

There were courses in elocution, voice training, fencing and gymnastics. She played many parts. Hermione in "A Winter's Tale" and minor rôles in important plays.

Ricardo Cortez seems to be badly smitten in this scene from "The Torrent," Garbo's first American picture. Despite misgivings, she rocketed to fame.

Nothing light and gay about this love scene from "The Temptress." Antonio Moreno means business and La Belle seems to be taking him seriously.

The most outstanding of these was called, "The Invisible Man" in which she played a derelict not unlike her rôle in "Anna Christie." Her vocal teacher, Karl Mygren, declared that Greta's voice showed "a nice depth and resonance."

Mauritz Stiller came into Greta Garbo's life through the abruptness of a telegram. She had never seen the man, although his fame was renowned through the Swedish studios. Stiller was the Griffith of Swedish pictures and to this student at the dramatic school, a girl who had never seen him, he wired: "If interested in film work please interview me at ———," giving the address of his home. This was the Spring of 1923.

Of this meeting with the man who was to be such a tremendous influence in her life, Greta said, "It was so strange. When I arrived, he was not there. I waited, full of fear in the great shadowy hall of his fine house. At last he came in, he and his huge dog. I trembled. He watched me so strangely—though he did not appear to be very interested. He questioned me after the routine fashion. How old was I? What experience had I had besides the school? I answered to the best of my ability. I did not feel I impressed him, although he said at my departure, 'At the first opportunity I shall remember you.'"

It was in February, 1924, that Stiller once again communicated with Greta Gustafsson, as suddenly and unexpectedly as before. But this time, when Greta was ushered into the presence of the great Stiller, fear had left her. She was reconciled to the idea that fate was arranging the outcome. This great, shaggy, homely man was seated behind his desk and once more she felt the power of those analytical eyes on her, which seemed to be dissecting her very being.

"I think," he said at last, "that I do not like your name. It is too long." To anyone but this shy girl, that alone would have intimated the plans Stiller had in mind for her, but to Greta it was just another proof of his lack of interest. "From now on, we shall call you Greta Garbo. How do you like that name?"

She nodded her head mutely, hardly hearing the name he had bestowed upon her, a name that was to circle the world as a synonym of romance and glamor. Thus did Greta Gustafsson become Greta Garbo!

Stiller had arranged a test for her, although he did not confide even the barest details of what she was to do. Once on the set, with the cameras set up and ready to grind, he pointed to a bed in the corner and said, "Lie on the bed, you are desperately ill. You are close to death. Let me see you do this."

She was seized with an absurd desire to laugh. She, the meek, frightened, nobody, Greta Gustafsson, no "Garbo," was about to laugh at the great man, Mauritz Stiller. Flinging herself down on the bed, she gave way to her mirth, treating the direction as a joke. Suddenly Stiller was standing over her, those fierce, piercing eyes boring into her.

"Do you not know how it feels to be terribly ill?" he demanded sharply. "Do you not know what physical suffering is?"

Because she was frightened of this man who seemed to be so fierce, her giggles gave way to physical trembling. She was subdued and receptive to his mood. She could feel those eyes as she tossed about in "illness," for his test camera. Suddenly she knew the cameras had stopped and that Stiller had left the stage. Wearily she arose and began wiping the studio paint from her face.

IT WAS an assistant who informed her that she was cast by Stiller in his most ambitious picture, "Gosta Berling," to start within the week. At eighteen, Greta had taken the first step up the ladder that later was to lead to fame as no other film player ever enjoyed it.

"Gosta Berling" was the first inkling of what that fame was to be. Europe went quite mad over the new Stiller picture and the name of that strange girl, Greta Garbo, was on everyone's lips.

In the meantime, the great friendship between the girl and her director was growing. Those who knew Stiller well have no doubt but that the morose and difficult man knew a deep love for his protégée almost from his first meeting with her. To Greta, Stiller was the first important masculine influence in her life, and for this man who discovered her and made dreams come true, she had a reverential devotion. Whether or not it was considered a grande passion on her part, I do not know. In Greta's Hollywood home there is only one framed picture of a man. It is of Mauritz Stiller, and it rests on a small table in her bedroom.

Oh, Mr. Hays! Garbo and the late John Gilbert were in love off the screen as well as on while "Flesh and the Devil" was being filmed, which explains the realism displayed in this little huddle.

There's no doubt about it, she's terrific! Even Conrad Nagel, a calm enough individual, went haywire over her in "The Mysterious Lady." She was plumper in those days, you'll note.

venture that proved to be disastrous—and found his company, consisting of Greta and Einar Hansson, stranded for the Christmas holidays in Constantinople. The picture was never finished. The backers were completely bankrupt and the sorry little troupe returned to Berlin. Here Greta accepted a rôle in a German-made picture called "The Street of Sorrow."

Stiller's fame had spread to the film industry of Hollywood and Louis B. Mayer saw promise in the man who had directed "Gosta Berling." He cabled Stiller to the effect that he wanted to contract him for American-made pictures. Of the girl, Greta Garbo, he said nothing. "At least not much" is the way Greta refers to Mayer's initial interest in her. But Stiller was insistent. If he came to America, Greta Garbo must be contracted, too. Mayer was not interested in Garbo, but he was vitally interested in Stiller. If these were Stiller's terms, well and good. The girl could probably be put on a small salary, a deal which eventually went through on the terms of four hundred dollars per week the first year, six hundred dollars the second and seven hundred and fifty dollars the third, if they retained her that long.

Their boat, "The Drottningholm," sailed from Gothenburg, Sweden, in the early hours of a foggy morning. Her mother, her beloved sister (whom she was never to see again) and her brother gathered together to bid her farewell.

Greta first saw the New York skyline by night. It impressed her, yes, but it also terrified. There was something stupendous in its outline that was foreign and strange to her comprehension.

Newspaper reporters crowded about both Greta and Stiller. The chief interest of the press was centered in the director, however.

Stiller and Garbo did not immediately entrain for Hollywood. There were several affairs concerning their contracts to be taken up with the New York representatives of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. This caused a delay of a couple of months.

Finally all arrangements were completed and Stiller and his protégée departed for Hollywood.

When she finally arrived on the coast, Greta lived in an apartment not far from Hollywood Boulevard. Then she moved to the Miramar Hotel, a huge, rambling place overlooking the bluffs of Santa Monica where for the first time she began to believe something of the beauties of her new home.

For the most part she was free to walk along the sands of the beach, lonely, unknown, unhappy. Usually she lunched at some wayside stand on a glass of milk and a sandwich.

In the evenings Stiller always joined her and they dined at out-of-the-way tea rooms, talking over what information he brought with him from the studio. Then they would walk, or perhaps visit a picture show together. The same loneliness she had known in her childhood descended on her spirit and engulfed her.

AT LAST the exceedingly slow studio wheels got into motion. It was decided that Greta's first picture should not be under the direction of Stiller, but with Monta Bell. The picture was "The Torrent," originally slated for Aileen Pringle, but given to Greta as a test of her ability. It would prove her an actress or not.

Greta was dismayed at this change in plans. Not to be directed by Stiller? To be thrown on what she believed to be the unfriendly guidance of a man perfectly strange to her, a man who did not speak her language, nor understand her abilities? She would have definitely rebelled if Stiller had not intervened. He advised her it was the best move to make.

"The Torrent" was a Spanish costume picture. It was begun in the fall of 1925 and it is hard to tell who had the most misgivings—Bell, the studio, or Garbo herself. The studio employed a young fellow from the Swedish consulate, Sven Hugo Borg, to act as interpreter so that the director might be able to tell the full meaning of her rôle. But this well-meaning attempt made the bewildered girl only more self-conscious. One thing it did, however, was to inspire Greta with a feverish desire to master the English language.

In due time "The Torrent" was released. Stiller and Greta attended the preview at a small house at Santa Monica. About her she could hear people whispering, "Who is this Garbo girl?" It pleased her, but for final praise, she awaited Stiller's word. "It is good," he said, and those three encouraging words were sufficient.

Her second picture, "The Temptress," was to be made with Stiller, as he had arranged. At the beginning it held limitless promise of happiness for them both. Before it was completed it had dealt tragedy.

The first blow fell two days after it went into production. Mauritz Stiller, unfortunately, had not yet mastered the American method of making pictures. Handling crowds gave him trouble, and his lack of English made every move difficult. Fred Niblo was put to work on the production!

Stiller was heartbroken, he was crushed, but even he did not suffer as Greta did. The story they had talked and planned over as their first American triumph together turned to ashes in their palms. For the first time in their close association, it was Greta who consoled and counseled Stiller, who listened. He was to take more time learning American methods, everything would come out all right.

Those who had the fortune to know Mauritz Stiller, in intimate friendship, say that he never drew a happy breath in America after that day. He did not fail. Later with telling success he was to direct "Hotel Imperial" with Pola Negri, "The Confessions of a Woman" and "Street of Sin" with Emil Jannings. But it was the beginning of the shattering of his spirit which, they say, brought him to a heart-broken death in Sweden a few years later.

Greta certainly got around, cinematically speaking. Nils Asther was the gent in "The Single Standard." He had a yacht and everything, to lure our heroine.

Greta in a cajoling mood. John Gilbert doesn't look as though he wanted to give in, either, in this scene from "A Woman of Affairs," one of her best pictures.

THE SECOND disaster to occur during the filming of "The Temptress" was the death of Greta's sister. It was the crowning heartache of a picture that had been ill-fated for Greta since the starting crank of the camera. "My little sister," Greta said dully when the news was broken to her. "My dear little sister."

She turned to her work for solace. She was the first to arrive at the studio, the last to leave. She remained on the set even after her scenes were finished for the day, watching the other actors, discussing next day's work with Fred Niblo.

Before the picture was out of the cutting-room the studio officials knew what a prize they had in Greta Garbo. Los Angeles went mad about her at the preview, as did every other place. It was arranged that she make a personal appearance at Loew's State Theatre during the run of the picture. It was explained to her that she was to wear evening clothes and take a bow from the stage. She did not like the idea and said so. Always she has fought for privacy. But they begged. She made her final stand: "I have nothing to wear." But they would remedy that. She should appear in the loveliest gown of the studio wardrobe. At last she consented.

So it was in borrowed finery that the girl—too awkward, too badly dressed to attract attention by her natural personality—met an American audience over the footlights for the first, and last, time and swept them off their feet in enthusiasm for Garbo.

"This I shall not do again," she told the publicity men driving back from the theatre.

FOLLOWING "The Temptress," Metro directors began to vie for Greta Garbo's services in their pictures. Clarence Brown was preparing work on "Flesh and the Devil" for the screen and he wanted Garbo for the rôle of the woman. The late John Gilbert was to be the male star, and Greta's old friend from Sweden, Lars Hanson, was to play the friend. With such a cast, Brown believed he had a super-picture.

"This picture needs Garbo," he insisted to studio officials. But at first they were not sure. Brown used every argument, and at last he was permitted to have his way.

John Gilbert was at that time monarch of the movie world. A dashing, restless personality, he was more like a high-strung boy than a grown man. He was warm, impulsive, outspoken and friendlier-than-a-pup. In short, he was everything Greta Garbo was not.

At first Gilbert had not known of Garbo's existence. When she arrived on the lot she was new, awkward, not pretty in the Hollywood sense, and aloof. But soon he began to notice her. "That lady is most attractive," Gilbert once laughingly remarked to a friend, "but cold."

When the announcement came that Gilbert and Garbo were to do a picture together, Hollywood was intrigued. "A study in combustible frigid air," one wag put it and the rest sat back waiting for the explosions. Naturally Gilbert would be attentive to her. Gilbert was attentive to all women. However, it was known that Greta discouraged all attention other than Stiller's, and it was expected that their (John's and Greta's) association in a picture would prove interesting.

"Flesh and the Devil" was begun, and in place of the temperamental explosions, the two strangely mated stars got off to an immediate and surprising friendship. Gilbert was not to be put off by Garbo's show of illusiveness or her evident desire for privacy. He talked to her continually. His laugh rang out joyously and boyishly as they talked between scenes. Always his manner towards Greta was flattering and attentive.

To the lonely and heartsick Garbo, who still grieved over the death of her sister, he was a tonic. He joked where she knew no jokes. He was color and life, where she knew only depth and suppression. Soon it began to be whispered about that Garbo was laughing with Gilbert, that Garbo was lunching with Gilbert at the studio café. At that time, she said of him, "John Gilbert is a wonderful man. It is fun to be around him." It was more than fun to her. Those who know Greta say that if Gilbert had not come into her life at this time, she would have forsaken her American screen career. He was the first spot of warmth in her life since she had left Sweden.

SOON IT began to be known that Gilbert was calling on Garbo at her seaside hotel. "But what of Stiller?" mused the gossips. That is a question that has never been fully answered. No one was close enough to any of the three to know except by their lips, and the trio was silent.

John Gilbert never made any secret of the fact that he was madly in love with Greta Garbo. What might have started as an interesting flirtation, developed into a grande passion on his part. To people who came to talk to him of himself, he talked of Garbo. "A divine woman," he said; "The most amazing woman I have ever known."

And Greta, was this love to her? Who knows? Certainly she went out of her way to please Gilbert, to entertain his friends, to try to become one of the gay circle his personality drew.

The girl who had been so timid, boldly took up a new mode of living, if not for his sake, at least at his side. For the first time she entered into social life as it is known in Hollywood. Gilbert and Garbo attended first nights. Gilbert and Garbo dined together in popular cafés. Their close friends were the late Lilyan Tashman and Edmund Lowe, Eleanor Boardman and King Vidor. With Eleanor and King and Jack, Greta played tennis on Sundays and was proud when she made a good play. "Look," she would call to Gilbert. "That was a very good shot."

Once, at a football game, Greta, Gilbert, Lilyan and Eddie Lowe sat in front of me. Greta wore a magnificent sable coat and sat like an unthroned Queen on the rough wooden benches. She did not understand a move of what was going on in the field below. But she simulated interest. It began to rain. Gilbert did not notice. He cheered hoarsely until the last touchdown. Miserable, cold and wet, Greta said no word about leaving, merely attempted to cover her coat with sheets of the funny paper.

Greta began to resent the widespread insinuation that she did not dress well. To Lilyan Tashman, "the best dressed woman" in Hollywood, she appealed for help during shopping tours. It was not an unfamiliar sight to see Garbo laughs as though she really means it in this recently taken photograph. Only those who know her intimately ever see Greta like this, but it proves she can be vivacious enough when she wants to be.

She walks alone and likes it. Living up to all those stories you read about Miss G., here she is, big as life, all done up in mannish tweed and set for a hike. This time it's in New York City on her latest return from Europe.

Lilyan and Garbo in the more exclusive shops on afternoons they were both free from the studio.

GRETA and John quarreled frequently. Clear sailing even for a little while would be impossible to natures so radically opposed as theirs. For the most part they were nothing more than sweetheart quarrels. They would part bitterly, vowing never to see each other again. Gilbert would stalk to his home, and ten minutes later he would be talking penitently to Garbo over the telephone.

Once a quarrel assumed more serious proportions. The Beverly Hills police were electrified one midnight when Gilbert, of his own accord, but obviously acting under great excitement, strode into the jail and asked to be locked up. One story has it that he was flourishing a revolver. He spent a floor-pacing night in jail and was released the next day. The studio did everything in its power to hush the incident but gossip leaked out.

The most accepted story, but never verified, was that Greta had been dining with Gilbert at his home when they launched forth on one of their numerous quarrels. Greta telephoned Stiller to come and get her. In spite of Gilbert's violent protests she left with the Swedish director. And with all the impulsiveness of which a nature like his is capable, "Gilbert did one of his crazy things." It was soon forgotten.

"Flesh and the Devil" was a tremendous box-office smash. Everything combined to make it so. First, the high voltage power of the combined names of the stars. Secondly, the buzzing gossip that linked their names in romance. Here was drama—and the world was starved. Every whisper concerning them was spread by newspapers and magazines. It was said that Gilbert and Garbo had eloped—at least as far as a Justice of the Peace—and then Greta had changed her mind and decided she did not want to be married. Every move they made was watched lest they steal a march on the wary reporters.

In place of a marriage she supplied them with another kind of a surprise. Greta broke relations with her studio.

The company had planned a picture for her called, "Women Love Diamonds." Greta read the script and found it wanting. She did not care to become identified with vamp rôles and this picture featured a decidedly sirenish character. She argued with the studio officials, striving to make them see her point of view, but they were insistent on the story. Finally after she had said all she could, she merely rose and walked out! Here was the source of the famous "I tank I go home" story which has been so thoroughly circulated about her.

For seven months she was taken off salary. The loss of a weekly check did not matter a great deal to Garbo. She had always been rigidly economical, keeping a record of all expenditures in a little black book and carefully checking them at the end of each week. Even now Greta allows herself just so much for household expenses, clothes, medicines and incidentals.

When terms were eventually reached through Harry Edington, her agent, and the studio lawyer, Greta drew a gilt-edged contract that was a nine day wonder in Hollywood.

TRULY Greta was glad this war was at an end. She had been restless and now she was back at work. "The Divine Woman," based on the life of Sarah Bernhardt, was selected for her first picture under the new contract. To the Great Greta, who had been that timid, ambitious student, tip-toeing into classes at the Dramatic Theatre in Stockholm, worshipping at the shrine at Bernhardt, this opportunity to interpret her idol's story was a great thing. She read avidly of the life of Bernhardt to bring into the rôle the fiery interpretation she believed it called for. Her leading man was Lars Hanson who, with his reverence of the Divine Sarah, helped Garbo immensely. They both approached the picture with almost religious awe.

"Love," based on Tolstoi's "Anna Karenina," brought Gilbert and Garbo together in another screen appearance. Rumors of their romance flourished anew. The fans wanted more of the two as a team but the effulgence of the Garbo stardom was too bright. Each new picture increased her fame. There came "The Mysterious Lady." Then, "Wild Orchids" in which she was cast opposite her friend and countryman, Nils Asther. She also did "The Single Standard" with him. In her next, Greta was again with Gilbert—"A Woman of Affairs," which was adapted from Michael Arlen's famous "The Green Hat."

In the meantime, somewhere along the road, Mauritz Stiller had completed a Paramount contract, and although another was offered, he declined to accept and gave as his reason that he was returning to Sweden. Legend has it that America broke Stiller's heart. He was a Svengali without his Trilby. He returned to Sweden a dispirited man.

It was during the filming of "The Single Standard" that news of his death came to Hollywood and Greta. Garbo's grief for this man who had meant so much in her life was genuine and touching. Perhaps for the first time Greta realized what Stiller's complete loss meant to her. She said later when questioned about him, "Everything I have in life, I owe to Mauritz Stiller."

She grew lonesome for Sweden as her original mood again descended on her. Lonesome and homesick for her own people. "I must go back," she told the studio executives. "I cannot bear it if I do not go back."

IT WAS the desire of her proud studio to make her trip a testimony, and so a triumph of receptions were planned along the way. But Greta would have none of it. "I want to go back," she begged, "as I came." She even retraced her train route, disguising herself from recognition and keeping to herself.

Her boat eventually docked at Gothenburg, the same harbor from which Greta had departed. There was no chance for her to deny herself to the thousands of admirers who crowded the pier waiting for her. She did not want to. She waved to them—threw kisses. These were her people and she was home again. Straight away, Greta flew to the arms of her mother and with a police escort they fought their way to a taxi. Before they reached their destination the taxi was practically wrecked by the wild enthusiasm of the crowd. Stockholm went mad!

"Take it from one who knows, kid." The late Marie Dressler gives a little advice to Garbo in "Anna Christie," Greta's first venture into the talkie field.

Reporters from every Swedish paper secured lengthy statements from Greta, and she refused herself to none of them. After several days at her mother's house the mêlée and confusion of so much attention drove her to take an apartment at Karlhergsvagen No. 52, where she remained for the duration of her visit.

The first hour she was in the apartment the telephone rang sixty times, calls from her admirers who merely wanted to hear the voice of their idol.

Greta gave herself freely to the people of Stockholm. Nightly she dined in popular cafés and attended theatres. By day she visited the film studios, renewing old friendships, making new ones. For a few days she was the guest of Count and Countess Wachmeister, at Tistad Castle, south of Stockholm.

But the real purpose of her visit was to be with her mother. Often Greta would come up behind her and fold her arms about the woman she loves so deeply. "Now I am truly happy," she would say. The tenderest memory of her visit was when she and the little mother together went over the old family album showing pictures of the beloved sister and daughter, now gone, never to know the great fame that had come to Greta.

In America the rumors continued concerning that Gilbert-Garbo romance. It was said he was cabling Garbo daily. It was said he had heard of the attentions of a Swedish Prince to the lady of his heart and that he planned to go after her and bring her back his wife. But suddenly all rumors of Garbo and Gilbert were silenced for all time. John Gilbert was married to Ina Claire, in Las Vegas, Nevada.

On March 9, 1929, Greta Garbo once more embarked from Gothenburg, tearing herself from the arms of her mother and began the return trip to Hollywood. They say that before she left she journeyed alone to the grave of Mauritz Stiller and there placed a wreath.

SHE RETURNED to Hollywood and began a silent picture, "The Kiss," under the direction of Jacques Feyder. Everyone wondered what Garbo's fate was to be. Garbo was the undisputed Queen of the silent screen, but the screen was no longer silent. The Chattertons and the Jolsons were arriving from Broadway and new thrones were being erected.

As always in the times of confusion and trouble, Garbo drew more deeply within herself. She did not return to the seaside hotel, but rented a modest bungalow in Beverly Hills. She became as aloof and immune as she was in the first days of her life in Hollywood. It is said that she and John Gilbert passed each other one day at the studio and did not speak.

Here is a statement Garbo is recorded to have made: "Love is not really dramatic. It is what is behind love and romance that gives us the greatest emotions. I don't know what the greatest emotion really is . . . I wonder. It can't be hate, for hate is not a decent feeling. One should not hate. I don't believe any great thing has ever been accomplished with hate as a theme. Perhaps sacrifice is the great emotion. It is a big part of love. I guess, after all, the greatest emotion we have is just life—life which includes all the emotions there are. Marriage? That is not for me. I shall never marry—anyone!"

And if Garbo feels just a little bit confused about the greatest emotion one can experience, she is most certainly emphatic in her belief that she "will never marry —anyone!"

Together again, at Greta's request, Garbo and Gilbert in "Queen Christina." No longer was Gilbert a star, while she was Queen of the Screen.

As Greta's professional fate began to hang dangerously in the balance, and "The Kiss" was released without stirring the attention usually accorded a Garbo picture, she went seriously to work to master the English language.

It had been said that perhaps Garbo would be able to weather the storm by continuing with silent pictures. Her popularity was so great she might accomplish this. But Greta, herself, knew which way the wind was blowing.

It was decided that her first talking picture should be "Anna Christie," the most important reason being that the character, Anna, spoke with a Swedish accent.

It was a momentous occasion—that first morning on the set. The doors had been closed against all intrusion. Clarence Brown paced restlessly back and forth. Marie Dressler sat in a corner mumbling her lines to herself. Even the "props" and "grips" were imbued with the solemnness of the occasion. It was like a death hush.

At last Greta arrived. She strode briskly onto the set followed by her maid. She seemed gay, almost amused. Whatever panic she felt failed to show through. With mock sadness, she gazed about her.

"What is the matter?" she asked cheerfully. "What is so sad?"

"We shall rehearse . . ." began Brown nervously.

"No," said Greta, "we shall not rehearse. If it is to be as bad as all this, we will do the scene immediately—and get the worst over with." She stood for a moment taking one last look at her lines. Then she pulled the shabby hat of Anna to a more rakish angle, stepped before the microphone and began to speak.

"Gimme a drink of whiskey—ginger ale on the side—and don't be stingy, baby!"

On and on she talked. The scene ran almost nine minutes, an unusually long "take." At the end, Clarence Brown stopped the cameras and called for a "play back."

Everyone waited as the scratching of the loud speaker overhead presaged the coming of the "wax" or temporary check-up record of the scene. Then came the deep, vibrant Garbo voice in its first recording!

Brown smiled, a smile of mingled relief and elation. All over the set, electricians, prop boys, cameramen and script clerks looked at each other, faces beaming.

Garbo could talk! And how!

"Anna Christie" broke all records. It proved beyond a doubt that this lonely girl was still the Queen of the screen —talking or silent. Another star, another type of woman might have accepted this triumph as the signal to rightly take her place as the leading figure of the films.

But Greta remained a woman secluded. She became a woman of legend and conjecture, and so great was the demand for any bit of information concerning her, that she became the victim of a most relentless pursuit by the press.

Greta learned to fear to step out of her own front door. For two days she paced the floor madly, while a deliberate and cool photographer on the other side of the street set up his camera and trained it on her house. Often she would look from her window to behold a slinking figure of a reporter hidden behind a bush or a tree. It angered Greta. In fact, these reportorial tactics did much toward defeating their own purpose. Garbo looked on these journalists as molesting spies attempting to bully her into press interviews. She complained to the studio that the methods which reporters took were underhanded and shoddy.

Garbo's second talking picture, "Romance," adapted from the successful stage play of Doris Keane's, was started at the studio. It, too, was a dialect picture, this time the accent being Italian. "Will I never be able to speak English?" Greta asked in mock despair.

But she really loved the story of "Romance." It brought her back again to the world of illusion and grandeur, which is really the most suitable background for her personality. Greta liked the power and sweep of the rôle of "Anna Christie," but she feels her true medium is one farther removed from grim reality. Perhaps it is because Greta, herself, has from childhood worshipped at the shrine of all that is glamorous and romantic in the drama.

AFTER "Romance," Greta made "Inspiration," "Susan Lenox—Her Fall and Rise," "Mata Hari" and "Grand Hotel," in quick succession. Of this group, "Mata Hari," was the only picture to have any real bearing on her personal life. She met Ramon Novarro, who played opposite her in the picture, and who, during the course of its filming, became her very close friend. There was no hint of romance between them, despite the fact that Novarro sent her flowers every day, lunched with her and dined with her. Their friendship flourished, however, and she continued to see much of him even while she was making "Grand Hotel."

When "Grand Hotel" was completed, Greta returned for a second visit to her beloved Sweden. Novarro happened to know that he would be in New York just at the time she was due to stop over in the city, prior to sailing. Could they meet? He wanted to know. Where would she be stopping? Greta smiled her enigmatic smile, but she would not divulge, even to her friend, where she intended to stay while in New York, nor the day she actually expected to arrive. One afternoon, however, a box of roses arrived for Novarro at his hotel suite. There was a card, bearing two initials . . . M.H., and a telephone number. Nothing more.

He was mystified at first, until suddenly he remembered that in "Mata Hari" the same kind of roses had been used. The initials explained themselves. Greta was in town! She wanted him to telephone her! The incident was typical of Garbo, characteristic of her desire for privacy.

While abroad, Greta was not idle. Her greatest ambition had always been to bring to the screen one of the world's most colorful women . . . Queen Christina of Sweden. She did research in Swedish museums and libraries and when at last she set sail for America once more, she brought with her a vast wealth of historical material. Two years had elapsed since she had done a picture, when plans were made for the filming of "Queen Christina." The studio had imported an Englishman to play opposite her. But Garbo had other ideas.

She simply said, "Bring me John Gilbert."

It was no second flaring of a dead romance, this gesture, but rather one of supreme confidence, of complete affection and accord on Garbo's part. Gilbert was no longer at the pinnacle of his career, no longer a dazzling star. People had

A truly poignant moment from "Camille," with Bob Taylor doing all right as Armand. Between scenes, he clowned on the set and Garbo actually enjoyed it, believe it or not!

laughed at his first talkie, had already relegated him to a past era. But Garbo remembered him as he had been in their first triumph together and believed that he could again scale those heights.

SHE KNEW how much it would mean to his screen career to be in this picture with her and, throughout its entire filming, she saw to it that he got every break. And as they worked together, day after day, as they looked into each other's eyes, as they laughed and loved and wept before the grinding camera, it was apparently, strictly, play-acting, yet surely, deep within the heart of each, the embers of that love they'd once shared, still must have glowed.

When Gilbert died so tragically, however, there was no linking of Garbo's name with his own, no reference to her in any way. Whatever personal grief she may have suffered, whatever tribute she might have offered to his memory, no one will ever know.

Garbo's next picture, following "Queen Christina," was "The Painted Veil." George Brent played opposite her. A tall, blue-eyed Irishman, George, with a slightly crooked smile and a very small-boy air about him. No one could have been more of a contrast to John Gilbert, and, for that reason perhaps, no one had a better chance to captivate Greta's romantic fancy. Once again, she was known to laugh, to be seen in public, to attend social gatherings. And always with Brent as her escort.

They drove together and walked together and Brent was known to dine often at her home, but there was no talk of marriage. Obviously, with Garbo, her career came first. After completing "Anna Karenina," with Fredric March, she again went to Sweden for a holiday and while she was gone rumors ran rampant about mysterious romances in her own land. She returned to Hollywood, however, with no explanations. But it was a new Garbo who arrived in New York. She posed for photographers and laughed and joked with reporters, thereby completely flooring the press!

She carried this same jovial mood onto the set for "Camille." She liked Robert Taylor instantly. He was young and fresh and the first actor who very definitely wasn't awed by her, or frightened by her reputation. He broke all traditions by clowning on the set and she seemed to enjoy it. When Bob brought his portable victrola on the sound stage and started playing racy ditties, Garbo asked, "May I come over and listen?" And she did.

She also went on location with Bob for the first time in her career. Up until that time, she absolutely refused to budge from the lot no matter what kind of scenery the script demanded.

Outside of the studio, George Brent was evidently still her only romantic interest and then, quite suddenly, that was terminated by his elopement with Constance Worth. At least, terminated temporarily. The marriage lasted only a few weeks and almost immediately after its break-up, Brent again began his siege of the Silent One's heart. What the future will hold for this attachment, or for any other which may come into Garbo's life, only time will tell.

DESPITE HER success and the fact that she makes one of the largest salaries paid a star, Garbo hasn't an easy life. She works for her money. Once it is in her pocket book, however, she is willing to let the studio whistle for her. Before each picture goes into production she visits dress designer Adrian, and has long conferences with him. He sketches her costumes and she approves them. She rarely opposes his judgment because she realizes she herself has little style sense.

She never meets anyone in the cast before she goes into scenes with them. Nor does she throw fits of temperament on the set. She saves those for the big producers, where it counts. Woody Van Dyke, the director, shocked her when she first met him. He called her "Honey" and "Babe."

"Stand over there, Babe," he told her, when they got ready to shoot the first scene. Garbo looked at him in amazement and then she smiled. After a little, she even liked it! When she steps on a set, she knows her lines perfectly. No one has ever seen her studying a script. If she rehearses at all, it is for the benefit of the other players and she has never been known to try to steal a scene. If there is any choice, she will invariably give another player the break.

All dressed up for an evening at the Troc! This is what the candid camera boys got, after lurking in the bushes for days—well, hours, anyway.

Garbo rarely spends money. After "Queen Christina" was finished, she gave everyone in the cast a bottle of Scotch and everyone was surprised. That was the only time, before or since, that she passed out gifts, although it is a custom in the Hollywood studios.

Her most recent picture is "Conquest," in which she plays with Charles Boyer. Mr. Boyer found her gracious and charming to work with, a beautiful and fascinating personality. The girl who was born in an humble home in Stockholm, who lathered customers in a barber shop, modelled hats and came to Hollywood a poor, shy creature who feared her own shadow, is gone. At least outwardly so. In her place is a woman of the world, cultured, famous, wealthy.

But is she happy? No one knows. Garbo will not say. Always, there is the suggestion of tragedy about her, a sort of wistfulness that is apparent even when she smiles. There are highlights and depths to her life story that will ever remain a mystery, for no one is sufficiently close to Garbo to know the emotion she has buried. Intimate friends have remained intimate only as long as they have remained discreet. The instant they flaunted their friendship with Greta, the association was terminated. She is still aloof, unpredictable. Perhaps it is because her soul can never really be free of that awkward, unhappy and timid child, who was the Greta Gustafsson of Stockholm, Sweden.

A lovely portrait of a lovely lady. Garbo, as she is today, poised, charming, but for all that, still aloof and as unpredictable as the winds.

A New Cream brings to Women the Active "Skin-Vitamin"

Puts into skin the substance that helps to make it beautiful

A NEW KIND OF CREAM has been developed!

A cream that puts into women's skin the substance that especially helps to make it beautiful—the active "skin-vitamin."

For years, leading doctors have known how this "skin-vitamin" heals skin faster when applied to wounds or burns. How it heals skin infections. And also how skin may grow rough and subject to infections when there is not enough of this "skin-vitamin" in the diet.

Then we tested it in Pond's Creams. The results were favorable! In animal tests, skin that had been rough and dry because of "skin-vitamin" deficiency in the diet became smooth and supple again—in only 3 weeks!

Women who had long used Pond's Cold Cream tried the new Pond's Cream with "skin-vitamin"—and found it "better than ever." They said that it gives skin a bright, clear look; that it keeps skin so much smoother.

"GIVES BETTER COLOR. NOW MY SKIN IS CLEARER"

Joan Belmont—now Mrs. Ellsworth N. Bailey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Belmont

Exposure dries the "skin-vitamin" out of skin. Mrs. Bailey says: "I am so glad to use the new Pond's 'skin-vitamin' Cold Cream. It keeps my skin finer and softer, in spite of all my sports."

★★ Forty-Five Fathers

You'll have a hard time finding a show in town that can beat this for pure, wholesome fun. It's Jane Withers at her best—and even if Jane Withers in any form doesn't appeal to you, you'll find the laughs stacking up on you, anyhow. And the plot, though a completely goofy one about a little girl who is adopted by forty-five elderly gentlemen, is still the kind that holds your interest. The most entertaining episodes can be chalked up to the credit of the Hartmans, Mr. and Mrs., who are a dance team of no small merit, and good comedians to boot. They are also ventriloquists, which leads to an original and highly diverting climax, when the two voice-throwers show up the crooks in a courtroom trial.

In the cast, and giving good performances, are Thomas Beck and Louise Henry, as the romantic interests, and Richard Carle as the unfortunate "first father," who adopts the busy-body, Jane. From the time she sets foot in her new home things start popping, and though Jane gets herself and everyone else in hot water, it all works out for the best—of course.

Worthy of special mention for some high spots in the picture are the doings of Sammy Cohen and George Givot, in the respective roles of Jane's dancing and singing teachers. In short, this has enough good scenes in it to recommend it. Directed by James Tinling.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ Merry-Go-Round of 1938

In its straight vaudeville moments, this is a joy to behold, because it allows Bert Lahr and Jimmy Savo to indulge in some of their favorite tricks. Each of these stage favorites has tried the films before, but the results were so negligible that this can really be called their official screen debut.

The story is one of those things, concerning the love of an aristocratic young man (John King) for an orphaned daughter of Broadway (Joy Hodges). The young lady has been brought up by a vaudeville quartette, Bert Lahr, Jimmy Savo, Billy House and Mischa Auer, and the picture's plot has to do with the efforts of her guardians to break down the resistance of the young man's mother (Alice Brady).

Joy Hodges has a personality, excellent limbs (legs), and a good singing voice. In other words, she has a future. Mischa Auer furnishes much of the comedy in the role of a fake Swami, but Billy House, the fourth member of the quartette, may as well have remained back on Broadway. Directed by Irving Cummings—Universal.

★★ Lancer Spy

Just when you think spy pictures are about as old-fashioned as gangster epics, out comes a pretty good film which has everything to excite and interest a movie audience. The garrulous Gregory Ratoff, in his directorial debut, manages to keep his story plausible and his pace absorbing.

Story, with a World War background, is based on the resemblance between a captured German officer and a British naval lieutenant. The lieutenant spends weeks in a jail cell secretly observing his prototype, then "escapes" with the German's orderly, and makes his way to Berlin, where he hopes to learn Prussia's plans for a drive on Paris. In Berlin he is made a national hero, but the secret police suspect him and keep constant watch on him. Further complications are added when a night club dancer, who is also a German spy, falls in love with him.

Acting honors go to George Sanders, who plays his dual part with finesse and conviction. In his first leading role, Sanders promises a fine screen career. Dolores Del Rio, always pleasant to look upon, does well in the role of the dancer, and there are expert portrayals by Peter Lorre, Joseph Schildkraut, Sig Rumann, Maurice Moscovich and Lionel Atwill. Directed by Gregory Ratoff.—20th Century-Fox.

★ Breakfast for Two

Frank Capra should never have made "It Happened One Night." True enough, it was a joy and a delight the first few times we saw it, but the public—and the poor reviewers—have been paying heavily for that pleasure ever since. What we mean to say is that "Breakfast For Two" is the 3,948th version of the Capra success, and while imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, it can certainly be carried too far.

Story has to do with the ne'er-do-well owner of a shipping line (Herbert Marshall), who winds up an all-night spree with a strange gal who turns out to be a wealthy young lady from Texas (Barbara Stanwyck). The young lady, bent on reforming her new friend, buys out his shipping business and eventually makes a man of him.

Herbert Marshall looks pained throughout the film, undoubtedly having read the script, which called for him to be slapped in the face with a layer cake and submit to several other slapstick indignities. Barbara Stanwyck does well with what the picture offers her and succeeds in appearing very attractive in spite of the above proceedings. Eric Blore plays his familiar butler role, and Glenda Farrell does a small part as a gold-digging blonde. Best in the cast are Etienne Girardot, Donald Meek and an unbilled dog. Directed by Alfred Santell.—RKO-Radio.

This lavish production misses the mark all around and turns out to be an unhappy hodge-podge of mediocre musical comedy with a dull and sentimental story which fails to hold the works together. Starting back in the days when 52nd Street was society's stronghold, the gradual changes in the street are depicted—through the days of prohibition, speakeasies and its final return to "respectability."

Snobbiest of the 52nd St. snobs is Dorothy Peterson, who with her sister, Zasu Pitts, sticks to the family brownstone through the years. She has ruined Zasu's life, having forbidden her to fulfill her stage ambitions Then she breaks the heart of her brother (Ian Hunter) by refusing to recognize his show-girl wife, Marla Shelton. Nor will she have anything to do with their daughter, Pat Paterson, who also finds the lure of the footlights more exciting than the prospects of being a lady. Bolstering up the story is a succession of song-and-dance entertainments. Directed by Harold Young.—Walter Wanger.

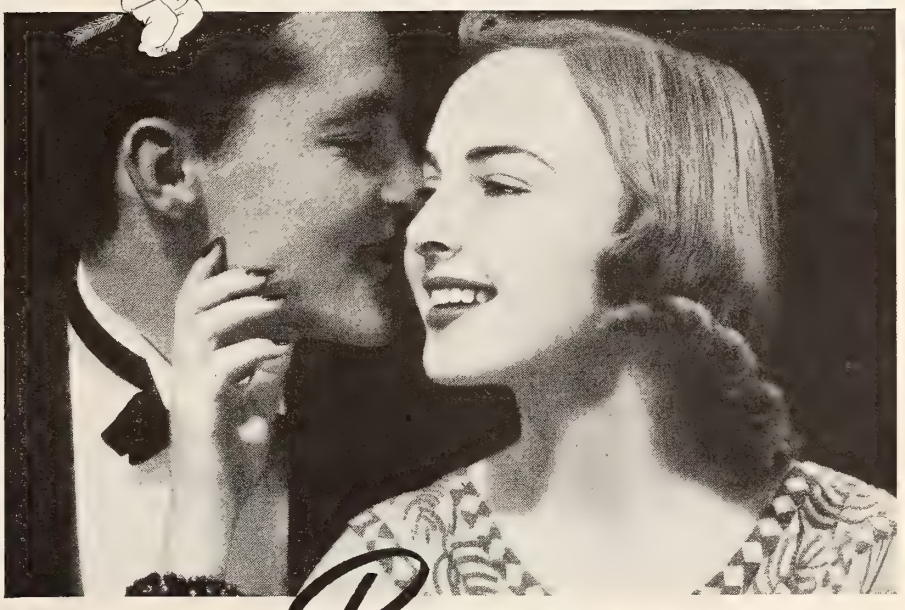
themselves in placing accents of brilliancy not only on evening gowns, but also on formal afternoon frocks or on the accessories to be worn with them.

Betty Jaynes and Lynne Carver, two of Hollywood's younger starlets, knew when to stop when they selected the gowns they show you on the opening pages of this article—Lynne's for afternoon and Betty's for evening formal wear. You will see at once what I mean when you note that while they glitter, they do it in a quiet way, so that their personalities and beauty are not overpowered by the brightness of their costumes.

Green mirrored ornaments decorate the blouse of the black crêpe dress, shown on Lynne Carver, whom you saw in "Madame X." This is the perfect type of dressy afternoon frock, which can be worn to luncheon, and on through the cocktail and dinner hours. The criss-cross treatment of the high neck is interesting, as is the shirring at the center front of the skirt, bringing all of the fullness forward, to descend in a panel of loose drapery down the front in Grecian style. The bodice of the dress is closely fitted, corselet fashion. Her pencil-slim skirt is quite short, for we are going to be wearing them thataway for quite a while yet. The small black velvet turban has a flattering veil trim, another style feature which spells allure. The bright ornament on the side carries out the glitter effect of the dress. Black accessories—a smart zipper, suede envelope purse, suede shoes and gloves—complete the ensemble. The touches of brilliance on this frock are toned down, being confined to the blouse only. Also, Lynne wears no jewelry with this costume, the mirrored ornaments doing a very satisfactory job of providing just enough flash without being flashy.

Betty Jaynes is still in her teens, but doesn't she look grown-up and sophisticated in her long dinner gown? Betty is a comparatively recent arrival in Hollywood, having enjoyed the distinction of being the youngest prima donna ever to star in Grand Opera, when she astounded music-lovers last winter in Chicago by the beauty of her voice. She has a seven-year movie contract, so you'll be seeing lots of her. Among the gowns she has chosen for her first Hollywood season is the black wool crêpe dinner dress, embroidered with silver leaves, which she models for you.



ALTHOUGH black with silver brocade might be too much for a young girl to carry, the clever lines of this dress keep it from being too sophisticated, too "old" for our Betty. The youthful, shawl-like drapery at the shoulders forms quaint little-girl sleeves and continues across the neck to be tied in a fetching knot at the center. The fullness of the skirt is pulled back to form a small train, thus giving the much-desired sheath-like silhouette across the hips, and fashionable willowy slenderness to the lines of the skirt. An important style note in this dress is seen in the fact that wool crêpe, formerly a purely sports or utilitarian fabric, is now being used for formal gowns, dressed up by luxurious embroidery.

Betty's accessories with this costume are very simple. Her shoes, which you can't see because of the length of her gown, are black strap slippers, cut out at the toes and trimmed with silver. She carries a simple pouch bag of white brocade shot with silver, and wears a silver fox cape. But don't let the silver fox frighten you, for a cute "chunky" coat of white lapin would be just as appropriate and becoming.

Taylor—A National Laugh?

I have been thoroughly disgusted with the way M-G-M has and is allowing everyone to humiliate Robert Taylor. I think it is ridiculous that the poor man can't even go on a vacation without having such unpleasant experiences. I think that shows poor protection on the part of his studio. They're always hollering about not being able to get desirable leading men. Is it any wonder?

If I had a hand in piloting the career of Taylor, I certainly would soft-pedal the "Beautiful Bob" stuff in a hurry. And as for hiring girls to hide in his cabin before he sailed for Europe! Well, to call that shoddy is an understatement!

No doubt, Bob appreciates the applause and praise for his work by the public, but at the same time he, too, would like to come and go as he pleases without being trampled underfoot by a wild mob at every turn of the road. It is a shame to see such a well deserved favorite as Robert Taylor turned into a laughing stock. He has talent, and if he would only land a he-man role where he can show his ability, we would get a different—and the right—viewpoint of him.—Guy Stanton Ford, Minneapolis, Minn.

Cheap studio publicity tends to make a national laugh out of Bob Taylor, instead of a national hero, says one fan.

A Guess Whosit

There's a blonde and sprightly starlet on the shadow stage today,
Who is busy going places in a sure and certain way.
From her first attempt in talkies to her last breathtaking hit,
There's no singing star who's like her,
even just a little bit.
She's improved so unbelievably in looks and screen technique,
We are sure she's irrevocably on top of the movie heap.

Once I thought her only asset was a sweetly throbbing voice
And I doubted George White's judgment
when he made her leading choice;
But today her varied talents leave us no more room for doubt
That this clever little actress knows just what it's all about,
For she copped a role in pictures once assigned the Plat-num Jean, Female lead "In Old Chicago," yearned for by each movie queen.

When her screen plays are presented, full of dancing, singing fun,
I would rather lose my pay check than to miss the poorest one.
Though I'm sure you must have guessed it, I had better tell the name
Of this most attractive player whom you know by face and fame,
Tuneful singer, nimble dancer, up-and-
comer, here to stay,
The delightful, lithe and lovely, one and only Alice Faye.

What Say, Managers?

Due to lack of funds, school terms in several communities hereabouts were cut considerably, so that the children had extra long vacations. I don't know what we harried mothers would have done without the movies. They were the ideal place to send restless boys and girls, when inactivity began to pall on them. Picture houses were clean, cool, safe, and the movies this summer seemed especially excellent, far above the usual output. There were a number of return showings of such fine productions as "The Good Earth," "The Lost Horizon" and "Romeo and Juliet."

The biggest handicap was always having the money necessary for a large family of children, most of whom had to pay adult prices. I suggested to our favorite movie house manager that there be issued a special holiday season pass for school children. Really, these young people are Hollywood's most enthusiastic and loyal supporters, and often through their insistence the whole family group goes to the movies.

Children's ages for paying adult prices are usually set at twelve years. If this were raised to fifteen or sixteen, I believe a larger, more regular attendance of youngsters would increase theatre receipts considerably, and would educate the children into millions of loyal adult fans.—Mrs. G. M. Jackson, Ludlow, Ky.

Questions Without Answers

The following questions have been puzzling me for a long time.

1. Why is it that lovely young heroines always have fathers but seldom mothers?
2. Why are the fathers of these lovely young things always senile men with one foot in the grave?
3. Don't movie folk ever start to raise families until they are over fifty? If not, why not?
4. How many people in real life do this?

"Why are the heroine's Mama and Papa always middle-aged" is the question that's bothering an Ohio Miss.

It's rare and you know it—'cept in films.

I'm a mother of a sweet young thing in her twenties and I'm not only not dead, but I have no gray hair, no false teeth, weigh under a hundred pounds, look and feel young! Her dad is no bewhiskered grandpa, either. He is along around the age of Warner Baxter and Buck Jones. We're average people! Gosh, give us something more like real life!—Helen Heide, Springfield, Ohio.

A Just Complaint

Please allow me to use your forum to give vent to an angered opinion of a very nasty and uncalled for remark in the script of "Between Two Women." I mean the scene in which Virginia Bruce, portraying an heiress wife of a doctor, calls Maureen O'Sullivan, playing the role of a graduate nurse, "a glorified chambermaid."

Were Miss Bruce, the script writers, producers or any of the clan in need of medical care, they would welcome the care and experienced services of a registered nurse, whom they so casually call a chambermaid. It has taken years of hard work and untold patience for those in charge of hospitals to elevate nursing to its present high standard. Even the type girl Miss Bruce portrayed would hardly stoop so low as to utter a remark about a character so far above her.

I believe the producers of "Between Two party. "We was sittin' talkin' the other day. And Errol says, 'Sailor,' he says, 'I'd like to get acquainted with the boys. I don't know most of 'em. Bring 'em over to the house, and we'll start 'em off with a headache,' he says. So when we got through work today, we took a bath and here we are.

"Some stars throw you a party when the picture's over. Errol, he's the only one that throws it first. He don't want to be no star. And again, he don't do it to be a good fella, see what I mean? He don't go 'round slappin' people on the back, and then when they leave, call 'em bum. He does it because he likes to be friends with the boys and have fun. He likes to laugh. Damn if I ever see such a guy for laughin'."

"What's he blathering about?" inquires Flynn, coming up behind us. "Did he tell you he was champion boxer of the Navy? Did he tell you he's been fired more times than he's been on his back in the ring?"

"Errol," stage-whispers Sailor, "what about them carrots?" Errol wheels and disappears into the house. A few minutes later a procession issues forth. Sheffield and a Japanese boy bear laden trays. Behind them stalks Flynn, a lordly salver poised on the fingers of his right hand, on the salver two carrots. Left hand at his hip, he changes his rhythm and swings, a là Salome, toward one of his guests. Dropping his head demurely, he presents the carrots.

"Thanks, slave," says the guest, picks up the carrots and starts crunching.

"Gentlemen," calls Flynn. "Three cheers for the company horse."

"He ain't no horse," Sailor whispers kindly in the midst of the uproar. "Only a vegetarian." The garden is full of talk and laughter. A slim, dark-eyed girl slips through the door and stands watching the scene for a moment before she's spotted.

"What ho! Damita!" calls Flynn. But Sailor gets there before him, arm gallantly crooked. "Boys!" he booms proudly. "Errol's Missus!"

LILI'S clear laugh rings out as she spies the carrots. "Did Fleen put a joke on you? When Fleen puts a joke on me, I geeve it right back to heem. Like this. You pair-meet?" Eyes dancing, she takes a bit of carrot from the vegetarian and offers it to Fleen. He nibbles at it gravely from the palm of her hand, then lifts his head and nickers. Wild applause. Damita's struck a homer, first crack. She's in.

"Fleen darling," begs Lili. "Show them Sheff and the captain."

"Well," Errol complies, "I must first explain that Sheff is a landlubber and gets seasick on the boat, which fills the old skipper with disgust. So he takes every chance he can get to show Sheff up. Now here's the captain, bringing the boat along the wharf. Sheff's standing in the bow."

"Dual role impersonated by Muscleman Flynn," someone announces.

Muscleman Flynn bows, then cups his hands round his mouth. "Hi, there! Take a line! Get a line ashore!"

Now he's Sheffield, shoulders hunched, standing miserably in the bow. He turns his head. "Line?" he quavers.

"Don't you know a line when you see one?" he bellows as the captain.

"Not so loud," giggles Lili. But by now Flynn is immersed in his art. A nimble step this way or that turns him from Sheff to the captain, and back again.

"Oh, you mean this thing," says Sheff. He stoops and picks it up gingerly between two fingers, lips curled in distaste.

"It's a rope," shouts the captain, "not a bloomin' caterpillar. Throw it ashore."

With the silly movement of a girl throwing a ball, Sheff casts the rope. It drops into the water. Flinging up his arms, he lurches this way and that and comes to rest with a thud on the deck. The captain strides past him. "Want a lollypop?" he snorts.

"Fleen, you're making it up!" squeals Lili.

"And here's Sheff getting his own back on the skipper when he comes to the house."

He shuffles in, twiddling his hat brim between his fingers, a straight old man, self-respecting, a little stiff, a little uneasy in alien surroundings.

Enter Sheff, looking down his nose. He speaks with his lips pursed. "Mr. Flynn is in the garden. You may put your cap there."

The captain lays his hat warily on a chair, and starts out. Sheff's eyes dart downward. "Perhaps you'd better wipe your feet," he suggests impersonally.

"Fleen! Sheff would never be so rude." protests Lili, into the gale of mirth that sweeps the audience.

As darkness falls, lights gleam from within the house.

"Mrs. Flynn, do you mind if we turn on the radio? There's a program some of the boys would like to hear."

"But, of course. I like to hear it, too." She leads the way in, surrounded by boys. A dozen hands move to get her a chair, but she plumps herself down on the floor, laughing, "Here I sit best."

AT the other end of the lamplit living-room someone strums "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody," on the piano. They start humming it. There is a gradual drift from the canned to the living music. One by one the masculine voices join and swell in the song. Sailor nudges Flynn. "Sing, Errol." The others take it up. "Sing, Errol." Obediently, he lifts up his voice

At last they've had enough. Or so Sailor thinks. Sailor doesn't believe in hints. "Time to go home, boys."

"A stirrup cup in the garden," suggests Flynn. They troop out into the garden, filled now with the chirp of crickets. The moon sails overhead. They lift their glasses. "To Robin Hood. And Mrs Robin Hood."

"And all of you," amends Flynn, his arm round his wife, tiny and childish-looking beside his tall figure. "Thank you. Goodnight. We've had a lovely time." It's the formula of well-mannered children. This is no crowd of Hollywood sophisticates, but a group of simple men whose mothers taught them long ago how to take leave of their hosts.

Damita and Flynn trail with them through the living-room and out to the front door. Motors start, purr, drive away into darkness. Flynn drops a kiss on his wife's head. "Tired, darling?"

"Oh, no. They are such grand boys." Her eyes turn mischievous. "I theenk I go weeth you to location, Fleen." From far away, its rollicking note undimmed by distance, a singing voice floats back. The two on the lighted threshold break into laughter as they go in, closing the door behind them.

because she wasn't up to the travesty of a Christmas feast. That night she cried herself to sleep.

CHRISTMAS, 1934, when Jane Withers got her first big break, was the happiest and most eventful one in her young life. She and her mother had been in Hollywood for a year and a half, and were making no headway. Jane worked as a model in a department store, entertained at newsboys' dinners, appeared over the radio and played extra parts in sixteen pictures, but the big break they had been waiting for never seemed to come. Finally, Jane got a chance to appear with Shirley Temple in "Bright Eyes," but the picture hadn't been previewed yet, and she and her mother weren't any too hopeful. They remembered how once before they had written their friends to watch Jane's acting in "Handle With Care," only to discover after the picture was released that Jane's bit had been cut.

Mr. Withers kept urging them to come home, and they agreed to come back for Christmas. Jane's contract with the Los Angeles radio station would be over by then, and there would be nothing to hold them in Hollywood.

Though Jane looked forward to seeing her father and grandmother, she and her mother hated to come home to Atlanta defeated and discouraged, for they had once been so sure that Jane would get somewhere in pictures.

At the preview of "Bright Eyes" in December, the preview audience went wild about Jane. There was no longer any doubt about her future, and Jane signed a long-term contract, a few days before the twenty-fifth. Over the phone, Mrs. Withers, her voice glowing with happiness, told her husband what had happened, and persuaded him to fly to Hollywood.

That Christmas it wasn't a defeated family that met in Atlanta, Georgia, but a happy one, rejoicing in Jane's good fortune, that met in Hollywood. Jane's father arrived in time for Jane's broadcast, and was present at the farewell party given for her by the radio station. He discovered how many real friends Jane made in Hollywood; and he was happy to see that even though the family had been separated and Jane hadn't had her father to discipline her, her mother had seen to it that she remained unspoiled.

Claudette Colbert believes she will never have so memorable a Christmas as was hers in 1935, for she was married during the Yuletide season to Dr. Joel Pressman.

"We had known each other for some time," she said, "but we didn't discuss the possibility of marriage until a few weeks before the wedding took place. I had a short vacation and Christmas seemed an appropriate time, so we were married. I shall always think of Christmas, 1935, as the beginning of the happiest part of my life."

Marlene Dietrich remembers most vividly December of 1934 when her husband, Rudolph Sieber, and her daughter, Maria, were reunited after a separation lasting several months. Maria was eight years old at the time and had written Santa Claus that she wanted a doll house and a whole doll family.

Marlene, who had been sick with longing for her daughter all those months, asked nothing more of life than to make Maria's holiday a happy one.

It required a special trip for Santa to respond to Maria's letter. The doll house

Is Your Skin Treatment LUCKY FOR YOU?

SOAP AND WATER	YES	NO

VANISHING CREAMS	YES	NO
STEAMING	YES	NO
TONICS	YES	NO

IF YOUR PRESENT METHOD LEAVES YOU WITH BLACKHEADS, COARSE PORES, DRY SKIN, THEN IT'S TIME TO SWITCH TO A PENETRATING FACE CREAM!

Let me ask you a perfectly frank question. What results do you expect from your way of skin cleansing, and do you get them?

First, you expect a clear, fresh skin, don't you? If your skin seems to have a dingy cast, or if blackheads grow in the corners of your skin, your cleansing method has simply failed to remove dirt hidden in your pores.

Then too, you'd like to have a soft skin. But how does your face feel when you smile or talk? Does it seem dry; does it feel a little tight? If it does then your treatment is not resupplying your skin with essential oils that help give it a soft, baby-like texture.

And of course you want a smooth skin. But if, when you pass your fingertips over your face, you feel tiny little bumps, then you cannot say your skin is smooth. Those little bumps often come from specks of waxy dirt which your cleansing method has failed to dislodge from your pores.

So let's be honest with ourselves. If you are not getting the results you pay your good money to get, then your skin treatment is not lucky for you.

How a Penetrating Cream Works

Women who use Lady Esther Face Cream are amazed at the improvement in their skin, even after a few applications. That's because this cream penetrates the dirt that clogs the pores.

Lady Esther Face Cream loosens blackheads, floats out the stubborn dirt that laughs at your surface cleanser.

At the same time, this cream re-supplies your skin with a fine oil to help keep it soft and smooth.

Try, Don't Buy

I do not want you to buy my cream to prove what I say. I want you to see what it will do for your skin, at my expense. So I simply ask that you let me send you a trial supply of my Face Cream free and postpaid. I want you to see and feel—at my expense—how your complexion responds to this new kind of penetrating cream.

I'll also send you all ten shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder free, so you can see which is your most flattering color—see how Lady Esther Face Cream and Face Powder work together to give you perfect skin smoothness. Mail me the coupon today.

FARR'S FOR GRAY HAIR

Irene Dunne and her husband, Dr. Frank Griffin, step out for a little night life during one of hubby's visits to the coast. He does all the commuting now that Irene has a young daughter to look after.

was a twelve-room affair, so large that Maria herself could enter it to cook meals on a real electric stove, clean the floors with a miniature vacuum cleaner, and fill small closets with complete outfits of clothing for her dolls.

Parents seem to feel pretty much the same, even when they're parents by adoption. More than anything else, Wallace Beery had looked forward to becoming a father some day. But years passed, and he had no children. When other parents celebrated Christmas with their children, he couldn't help feeling a pang. Finally he realized that there was very little chance that he'd ever have a child of his own. His only hope was to adopt one.

When Beery heard that his wife's aunt had died, leaving little fifteen-months-old Carol Anne, motherless, he adopted her.

His happiest Yuletide came when she was three years old, for it was the first one that she was old enough to appreciate. For days Wally went on shopping sprees. He bought all kinds of toys and dolls. The big goof didn't even know which toys were right for a girl of three, and he bought some she wouldn't be able to use for years. Then he sat back and watched her play.

He counted himself hardboiled, but the tears almost came to his eyes as he watched her. He knew that a great thing had happened to him—the greatest that can happen to any human being. He was no longer denied the privilege of fatherhood.

After that when things went wrong, he just sat back and laughed. Through one bad investment after another, he lost the comfortable fortune he'd piled up through the years. One day a reporter came to see him to find out how he felt about losing all that money. Wally just laughed and called Carol Anne over. He asked her to sing, and she sang a few notes off key. He asked her to laugh and she laughed. He fed her candy.

Then he said, "You know, that kid's nuts about me. And she's mine—all mine. Who in h—— says I'm unlucky?"

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND says her most memorable Christmas was a most bewildering one. She doesn't remember how old she was, but she was just a tiny child. She and her mother and sister were at Pebble Beach. They arrived on December 25th in a pouring rain and found their tree and presents and Christmas fixings all ready for them. Even though it was raining they had a grand time, for Olivia, born in Japan and raised in California, had never known a white Christmas, so she really didn't miss snow.

But the incident that made this particular one stand out was amusing. They got up in the morning and looked out over the Pacific and saw hundreds of seals lying on the rocks. With a laugh, Olivia's mother pointed to them and said, "Look, girls, Christmas seals!"

For a long time she puzzled over it, and because she was so puzzled, remembered it. To this day, whenever she sticks a Christmas seal on a package, she thinks of the Christmas seals at Pebble Beach.

Olympe Bradna's dark brown eyes glowed as she said, "The Christmas I'll never forget came when I was six years old. To understand it, you have to know that I always loved fairy tales. I was always dreaming of having dolls dressed like the princes and princesses in the fairy tales. This particular time I got three dolls, one dressed like a prince, another like a princess, and still a third doll dressed like a page boy, to hold the train of the princess."

"How nice," I said to Olympe, "but how did your parents know?"

She smiled tenderly. "Don't parents always know what their children want?"

Anne Shirley's happiest Christmas came when she was eight. When Anne was an infant, her father died, and left her and her mother unprovided for. Their life was a constant struggle against grueling poverty, with Mrs. Shirley working as chambermaid, elevator operator, housekeeper—anything to keep them from starving.

Santa, somehow, always passed her by. It was on her eighth birthday that he came for the first time.

"All my life," she told me, "I had wanted a doll's carriage, a real-honest-to-goodness doll's carriage made of brown wicker. And Santa brought it to me. The top of the carriage was adjustable and it had real glass windows in it, exactly like real baby carriages. And it was brown and the right kind of wicker. I actually cried with joy when Mother said it was for me."

DOUGLAS FOWLEY, whom you see playing gangster roles, has an unusual Christmas to look back upon. It was during the depressing year 1929 when, broke and out of a job for three months, penniless and hungry, he lived in the slums of New York. He had sunk lower and lower, until he seemed no different from the other down-and-outers who infested the Bowery, eager for a hand-out. He even ate with the bums and hobos at the Hobo Mission in the Bowery run by Mr. Zero, a famous philanthropist, who would feed anyone who was hungry.

This Christmas Mr. Zero asked if any of the men could entertain at their Christmas dinner, and Douglas offered to sing.

To these unkempt, discouraged men he sang "Jesu Bambino" and as he sang, his mind went back to another Christmas when he'd sung this very same song with the famous opera singer, Giovanni Martinelli. He was thirteen then and head of the boys' choir of the St. Francis Xavier Church in New York. How proud he'd been then of the distinction he had won! And the quiet, respectable churchgoing people had been impressed by the boy's clear young voice leading the choir.

But they hadn't needed that song or any song as these men yearned for something to awaken them from the lethargy, the hopelessness into which they had fallen. Somehow he must lead their thoughts away from the bleakness of their present situation. He sang as he never had before. When he began "Onward Christian Soldiers," the discouraged men joined in.

To Douglas Fowley that was the grandest day of his life.

The Christmas which Jeanette MacDonald recalls most readily was the first one after her father died. She and her mother were in Chicago, where Jeanette was appearing on the stage.

"I remember," she said, "that we were both downcast most of the day, even though we tried to be gay. As we were in a strange city, we had our dinner in a restaurant. I ordered a ham sandwich. Mother ordered a turkey sandwich. We both pretended to enjoy our food, but we barely touched it. That day stands out, because all my others have been so joyous."

Don Ameche's happiest Christmas was that of 1936. Don said, "It was the first time in all my life when I could get just exactly the gifts I wanted to give every member of our big family. I had bought the ranch in the San Fernando Valley near Hollywood for my mother and father. All my brothers and sisters, my wife and my two babies—all of us gathered at the ranch for the holidays and did we have one grand time! We had a big tree—lots of fun trimming it—presents for everyone, the big yule log in the fireplace. It was our first family reunion in years. Well, I can't recall any happier Christmas than that in my whole life."

"But," she leaned forward, "what I did last was the most interesting. I borrowed the oldest clothes, and on the hot nights I walked in the slums on the East Side. I walked by myself and sat on the stoops with the poor young girls. I sat right with them. I talked with them and became one of them. Now I know how they feel, how they act. I can go back to Hollywood hearing their voices, remembering their lives, and I hope that someday I can return it all to them.

"The taxi drivers!" She jumped up again. "They are the nicest. I talk to them. And they talk to me. They are the most colorful people in New York.

"Oh, there is so much I want to do. I want to go to the children's courts. No child is bad. I want to know why they are sent away to reformatories. I want to know everything. I want to see everything. This is New York to me. I told that to Clifford," she said. "He has been here his entire life. He was brought up on the East Side. They think he influences me. He doesn't. He holds me back."

I couldn't believe that. Somehow it seemed a case of my lady protesting too much. There had been so many references to Mr. Odets.

First, our luncheon date. "What will you say," she asked over the telephone, "if I tell you I cannot have lunch with you? My husband, he wants me to meet him and some friends. It is very important."

Later, when we did meet, and after she had said in that cordial continental way of hers, "Take off your hat. Let me see how your hair looks."

And I had remarked the length of her own hair, now hanging to her shoulders.

And she had said, "I'm letting it grow. Cliff wants it so."

Or pointing to the photographs of herself on the bookcase. "You must excuse all those pictures of me. This is my husband's apartment."

Sometimes she refers to him as Cliff, sometimes Clifford, often just Odets, but always his name creeps into the conversation.

His new play. "It's wonderful. 'Golden Boy' is the title. It is about a boxer, but it is more than that. It is very deep."

And "I must tell you what happened in Connecticut. If you don't believe me, ask Odets!"

What happened was very interesting.

A LITTLE boy heard I was there. He came to the door and inquired if I really lived in that house. When the maid told him 'Yes' he walked away. The next morning on the beach he came up to me. 'Are you Luise Rainer?' he asked. When I told him I was, he moaned, and fell into a dead faint." She stopped, dramatically. "I took him in my arms. After he came to, I said, 'Look, look at me. I am like your mother. I am like your sister. I am no different.' From then until I left, he sat everyday quietly by my side.

"But you see, that's the effect of Hollywood. They don't want you to be like anyone's mother or sister. They want you to be something that makes people faint! I don't want that. I'd rather play the part of a slavey in one of those fine Russian pictures than be a star in something that is a waste of time. I feel I have so much to give. Here they won't let me give it. I don't want to be in pictures people see

... USE Specialized MEDICATION

THE Modern Mother knows how important it is to use the proper medication at the proper time. That's why she uses specialized medication for different stages and types of colds—medication that's specially designed to attack the distressing symptoms right where they attack you—when they attack you.

At the first warning sneeze, sniffle, or irritation in the nose—quick!—put a few drops of Vicks VA-TRO-NOL up each nostril.

VA-TRO-NOL is specialized medication for the nose and upper throat, where 3 out of 4 colds start. Used in time, it helps to prevent many colds—or to throw off head colds in their early stages.

Clears Stuffed-Up Heads. Even when your head is all clogged up from a cold, Va-tro-nol brings comforting relief. It clears away clogging mucus, reduces swollen membranes, and helps to keep the sinuses open. It lets you breathe again. And Va-tro-nol is so easy to use—at home or at work. Keep it handy—use it early.

If first signs have been neglected—or a cold strikes without warning—use Vicks VAPORUB, the safe, external treatment. No "dosing"—no risk of stomach upsets. Best of all, no long waiting for relief to begin. For VAPORUB attacks the distressing symptoms direct—right where you feel them.

Simply massage VapoRub on throat, chest, and back at bedtime. Almost before you finish rubbing, it goes to work direct through the skin like a poultice. At the same time, its medicated vapors, released by the warmth of the body, are carried direct to the irritated air passages with every breath.

Proved in Clinical Tests Among 17,353 People

Both Va-tro-nol and VapoRub have been doubly proved for you—by everyday use in millions of homes, and by one of the largest clinical tests ever made on colds. For details see folder—"Vicks Plan for Better Control of Colds"—which comes in each Vicks package.

because they haven't anything else to do. I want to show them something worth while. I don't want to be a star! That's why I want to leave the screen and go back to the stage."

"Then you're not happy?" I asked.

"I am very unhappy," she answered.

"But I thought things would be different," I said, recalling our last conversation, one year before, in Hollywood. "You hadn't won the Academy Award then, you hadn't married Clifford Odets."

Just mentioning his name made her face shine, as if a light had been focussed upon it. "He, he is wonderful. We are like sweethearts, not husband and wife."

Her voice grew tense. "Hollywood is the same. I get the same salary as when I first came there. I have two and a half more years with my contract. I have no choice of pictures, nothing to say about anything. I go back now and do not even know what part they give me to play.

"It is like prison, Hollywood. It makes me think of the books I've read about Siberia where they thought up a terrible punishment. The worst prisoners are forced to pour buckets of water into a river. They spend their lives this way, pouring water into a flowing river, there is no end, no purpose. That is what Hollywood is to me. It is all so useless, so futile." Her voice trembled. I thought she was going to cry. She controlled herself and went on.

"They do not understand me. Not any of them. They call me 'the shrewdest girl in Hollywood.' That is because I am honest with them. I go to them and I say, 'Listen, I think you are the best motion picture company in the world, but I do not want to make motion pictures. I want to go back to the stage. I promise I won't work for any other company. I give you my word. Just let me go back. So they offer me a lot of money with a new contract for seven and a half years. When I refuse they say, 'Rainer, she is the shrewdest girl in Hollywood.' They think I refuse because I want still more money. But it is the seven years. I'd rather stay two and a half years at my old salary. But it seems so long, such a waste. If I leave, if I go on strike, if I go back anyway to the stage, they can stop me by law.

"Sometimes I like the work. I liked 'The Good Earth,' but not 'The Emperor's Candlesticks.' When I wanted to be dramatic, play the one good scene in the whole picture, they said, 'Smile, you look better that way.' My last 'The Big City' is all right, but my best scenes are cut out with a scissors. What good to do work if they cut it away?

"And they fight with me. They want me to do a gangster picture. I refuse. For every week I refuse to work they add a new week to the two and a half years, just like a prison, a Siberia.

"I have given up my California house. I don't want any feeling of permanence in Hollywood. Between pictures I will fly East to join Clifford. While in Hollywood I will live in one big hotel room. That will help me forget the two and a half years. It will make me feel like I am leaving any minute. That is the way I want to feel."

"Maybe your husband could help straighten out those contract problems," I suggested.

"Oh, no." She shook her head. "Clifford is too busy to bother about me."

The sentence was a revelation. It plainly showed who was the star in her family. The name, Odets. And it reminded me of another actress-playwright combination, Helen Hayes and Charles MacArthur. Helen Hayes tip-toeing around a large apartment, whispering in an awed voice, "This is Charlie's study." Charlie likes this . . . Charlie likes that, a worshipping chant throughout her conversation.

And I watched Luise Rainer, who appeared absurdly schoolgirlish in her simple Navy blue serge, tailored blouse and skirt, whose face had a kind of glow about it, about the eyes and the tremulous mouth. I remembered Helen Hayes who had that same look. They are both, I thought, women in love, terribly in love. They both really give. So I stared at Luise Rainer as long as I politely could, stared in the hope that I, too, could carry away a memory, that of a beautiful, little, live face. For a woman in love is a lovely thing to see.

Fascinating Frenchman

only to find it had gone. My wife and all my baggage was on that train. Worst of all, my wife speaks no English and couldn't get along without me! Finally, the station men decided that we could take a little car that is propelled along by pushing up and down on a handle bar effect. It was freezing cold and, with nothing but a medium weight coat and plenty of nervous energy, we started out. Luck was with us, for the train was delayed for an hour about forty miles out, and so we caught up with it.

"This experience taught me never to rely on what I read in the papers. In fact, nothing short of the rumble of guns could make me believe a war was on again."

IN answer to our query as to why some French stars are often disappointing in American pictures, while in French films they're good, Fernand replied, "You see, in France the film industry is run so entirely differently from America that it is hard to draw comparisons. Over there they don't have the facilities that are open to the companies here.

"For instance, here, everything necessary to make a good movie is at a company's disposal; while there, it is hard to do much because the limitations are so great. It is difficult to get together the necessary props for a scene other than a most usual one. So French actors are used to doing without and depending on the story to carry them through rather than correct and luxurious settings and costumes.

"In America, everyone is so movie-conscious that the studios will do anything to coöperate toward making an authentic picture. Making movies in France is just another trade, like the furniture or butcher business, and so they don't especially put themselves out. Another unusual thing is that only a third of the population of France supports the films. The rural districts are practically disinterested in them. Their inhabitants are stay-at-homes and seldom see the cinema. So, you see, it is not too easy to make pictures, what with the government limiting the cost of production to a couple of million francs, which, in American money, is equal to around two hundred thousand dollars."

We wanted to know about French players.

Fernand smiled, and with a sparkle in his eyes, remarked, "Of all the people who come to America to make movies, I'm sure that Danielle Darrieux is the most likely to succeed. She has talent for the screen as well as chic. She is a very shrewd young woman, too. That counts for much in this business.

"Simone Simon? Yes, she is good. But she is of the type that should be given a special sort of story. Otherwise, she is at a loss. In French films, she was a wild little thing—all appeal, who always gave a very tender interpretation of a role. That is Simone."

M. Gravet is in Hollywood making a movie titled, "Food for Scandal," which fact reminded us to ask him why there was resentment displayed in England over his latest picture, "The King and the Chorus Girl." To our surprise, Fernand seemed completely taken aback that any comparisons to recent historical events were drawn which might have offended the English.

"Oh, were there objections?" asked our French visitor, with a twinkle in his eye. "As a matter of fact, though no one will probably believe it, I had had that script for over two years. Had it not been for commitments abroad, the story would have been done long before the Duke's marriage. They changed the title in England, you know, to 'Romance in Paris.' Even so, it wasn't too well received and I can't imagine why, can you?"

"Yes."

"Now aren't you ashamed of yourself?" returned Fernand. "But, really, it is so hard to please everyone. In England, they fuss with me about my accent, saying, 'Fernand, be French, not English!' In France, they say, 'Fernand, where is le bon French?' Even in America, my director continually asks for more of a Continental accent. I thought they would want perfect English here, so I worked very hard to learn. But no, eet mus be ziss, oui?" mimicked Monsieur. "I am one of those unfortunate people who takes on the color of his surroundings—how do you call it—a chameleon?"

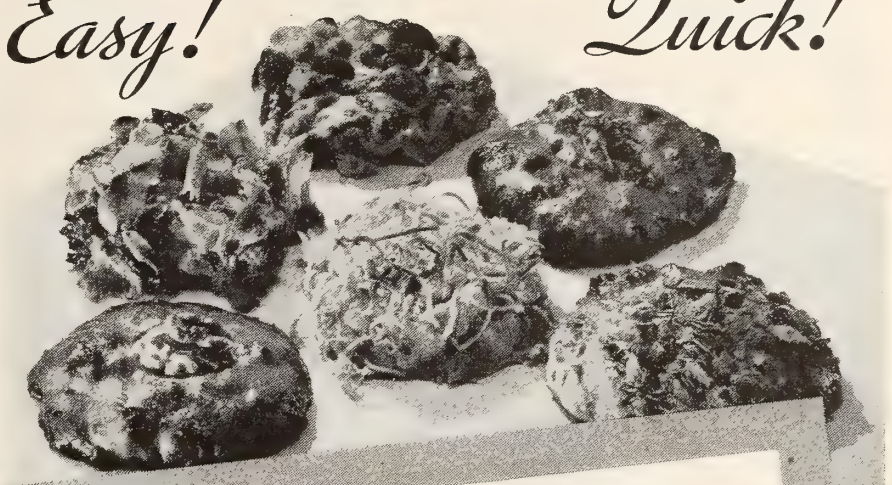
out visible human agency. At the entrance to the house, a man-servant said he would take me to Mr. William. We were joined by a small white dog wearing, around his neck, a round ruffle of tin!

Skirting the long blue swimming pool, we came at last, to a workshop, wherein the profile compared to Barrymore's was bent above a bench. On this bench were a drill-press, a bench-saw, a jointer, a grinder, a water-stone, a buffer, a sander and a flexible shaft outfit. The hands of Mr. William were moving deftly among these appurtenances.



I said, clearing my throat, after the first greeting was exchanged, "The—ah—the little dog here, what is that around his neck?"

"Oh," said Mr. William, wiping the grease from his hands, "that's just a little gadget I rigged up to check his wanderlust. It keeps him from burrowing his way through hedges and gaps in the fences and things. He can't do more than get his nose through any aperture with that on."

"So you are a gadgeteer."

"You've caught me with the goods, Vance," smiled Mr. William, strolling back toward the pool. "Yes, I am a gadgeteer. I sometimes wish I weren't. They keep coming at me all the time, ideas for new gadgets, you know. I really never get a full night's sleep. I have to get my rest in cat-naps. I wake up by fits and starts to find one of the little gadgets parked on my chest begging to be born. It's all very paradoxical. Because my one aim in life is to save myself the slightest unnecessary exertion, to do everything in moderation. And I am excessive about my gadgets. They defeat the very purpose for which they are conceived.

Tea for two. Rosemary and Lola Lane take time out for a little relaxation on the "Hollywood Hotel" set.

"You see, I believe in short cuts. Here, in this business, in Hollywood, we all live at high emotional tension. We might not suffer so many tragic and premature deaths if we took things more in moderation. I have made it a point, all my life, to read all of the great philosophers. And I have found that they are all agreed on the need for moderation.

"Well," said Mr. William, "I believe that to save time for leisure is the one way to reduce pressure. We have no social life at all to speak of. I'm afraid I am anti-social. I spend all my spare time in the workshop, doing things around the place. I level the orchards. I doctor all the trees. I invent devices. That affair there by the pool is one of 'em."

That affair appeared to be a mammoth table of yellow painted planks mounted on white painted, white-tired wheels. The whole was covered with a yellow and white awning. And it is, Warren explained, the chassis of an old Chevrolet, stripped bare, painted, mounted with a vast top (the original flooring), and electrified so that there are plugs for percolators, grilles, hot plates. And there you have a perfect gadget for the serving of large supper parties, out-of-door luncheons, etcetera. A movable cuisine.

"Then," said Warren, "I've invented a dog house. A sort of duplex, as it were. The whole affair is mounted on a central shaft. It revolves at will. The value is that the dogs can run, every day or so, on new grass. The usual dog house, being stationary, allows the dogs only one stretch of grass for a run. In no time at all, the grass wears down to the dirt. In this way, the grass keeps fresh and clean and green all of the time.

"The phone at the gate is one of my little notions. I think of the non-effort of my fellow men as well as my own, you see. The phone is on a pulley made of an old broom handle. It works on a counterweight. It precludes the necessity of climbing out of the car to call the house for admittance. I also have a small box by the gate, ingeniously concealed, in which I keep my key. So that, when I come in late, I can admit myself. I'm given to being rather careless about keys, watches, pencils, good intentions and other gewgaws. What I haven't got with me, I can't lose.

"At the back gate, I've invented a sort of a drawbridge. It works on a counterweight, too. It's a huge piece of timber, and it bars tourists from backing into my gate and, frequently, taking parts of it away with them."

I VE heard that you drive onto the set in your dressing-room. Is that true?"

"Oh," said Mr. William, rather reluctantly, "well, I don't like to talk about that very much. It's beginning to be recognized on the road. But if you already know about it, come along."

On the way to the garage, he said, "I hope I'm not giving you the impression that I believe in stinting on life. I don't. I believe in giving and giving generously, everything in you, to what is worth while."

He stopped talking, because, all at once, there it was! It is a truck to all outward appearances. Inside, however, it is a complete dressing-room. In fact, it is a complete apartment. The walls and ceilings are done in a light tan lastex. The floor is carpeted in rich dark brown. Beige curtains separate the apartment from the driver's seat.

Along one side of the truck stretches a couch, upholstered in ivory leather. Beneath the couch are compartments for storing bedding, books, anything. Along the other side are, first a copper wash bowl, with running water, rods for towels, below it a small basin. Next, a panel lets down and there is the bar, complete with bottles, a rack filled with bar glasses and openers. Below this is the kitchen, a small gas range, a cubby hole for china and cutlery. There is the library, a deep shelf, holding books.

Another panel lets down and becomes the dressing table. It is faced by a mirror. Electric lights frame the mirror. Behind this, is a deep well in which are hung the star's costumes. There is a desk, even a calendar. There is a radio, an electric fan and a ventilator in the roof. The wall lights are covered with pieces of picture film. In the dressing-room there is a plug for an electric razor. The whole effect is luxurious and all done in tones of copper and ivory and brown.

Warren said, "All this serves the purpose of saving time and effort. I can sleep an hour later on the mornings when I am working. Because, you see, I do not have to allow time to dress and make-up after I reach the studio. My houseman drives me. And I dress and shave and make-up as I'm going to the studio. When I arrive, we drive right onto the set, and I step out of the truck, ready for work!

"On my way home at nights, I remove my make-up and get out of my costumes. I do not have to have a dressing-room on the lot. Which means that I am saved the unnecessary exertion of walking from the set to my dressing-room, to change costumes, to have my luncheon. We bring food from home and it is prepared and served right in the truck."

WE STEPPED down from the truck and strolled toward the house. Mr. William led the way to his bedroom. Originally an attic room, it has been converted into a long, irregular and fascinating chamber of unexpected angles and proportions. It is painted a blue-green and the wide bed is covered with tangerine velvet. He showed me his tower closet. The tower is a revolving rack on the principle of the old revolving book shelves. It is set in an angle of the wall which would be, otherwise, wasted space. On the round shelves repose thirty pairs of shoes and thirty hats. There are compartments in between for numerous pairs of socks.

In the wardrobe proper, all of the William suits, robes, etcetera, hang from the ceiling. And instead of those shelves over the clothes hangers which are always too high for convenience, he has devised cupboards under the clothes for his shirts and other accessories.

On either side of the bed are tall electric lights enclosed in small cupboards. There, lights are on levers and can be raised or lowered at will, so that, when Warren feels like studying his script flat on his back, the lights can be arranged appropriately.

We walked back to the driveway. I said, "Do you think we should walk? There should be some gadget devised for . . ."

"Don't!" laughed Mr. William, "you may start ideas coming! I simply must have moderation, even as a gadgeteer!"

Good News

Montgomery and Rosalind Russell, living in Greenwich Village poverty, are faced with the problem of what to do for breakfast, Bob asks his pal and confidant, Robert Benchley, for a dollar. "Don't talk like that, Bob," says Mr. B. "It makes you sound hard."

The other day when Joan Blondell came home from the studio, young Norman Barnes' nurse met her at the door. She looked grief-stricken. Joan had immediate visions of Norman's falling out of second story windows and such. "What in the world is the matter?" she screamed. Almost overcome, the nurse managed to gasp out, "He's just said his first swear word." Joan let out a yelp, tore to the nursery and began yanking down all the curtains with the Mother Goose designs and throwing out all the pale blue furniture. Now Junior has he-man furniture and crossed baseball bats on the curtains, and Mr. and Mrs. Dick Powell are that proud of their son.

Myrna Loy was late for work the other morning. So when she finally showed up the whole cast and crew decided to hide. She came on the set, very chagrined, looked around, consulted her watch, looked puzzled and finally her expression changed from guilt to great relief. Up went the retroussé nose and she sailed to her dressing-room looking pretty smug. Then the whole cast and crew popped out at her. Some fun.

J. Edgar Hoover came on the set one day with the sole intention of meeting the screen's Public Enemy No. 1—Joseph Calleia. He caught Public Enemy No. 1 in a rather precarious situation. In his dressing-room, Joseph was standing around without any pants. He had just given them to his stand-in.

Hugh Herbert went out on a spree the other night. About dawn he began thinking of life and all its attendant vicissitudes. Chaos, he was convinced, was just around the corner. Movies were but fleeting fame. After an hour or so of serious talk with himself he decided that the back-to-the-land movement was the only safe course. So he took himself right out to the San Fernando Valley and bought up 240 acres of land. Next morning he went over to see what he'd acquired. It turned out to be just 240 acres of worthless land. But on a hillside, he found a spring bubbling. Taking a drink he shouted, "Wo woo, wotta drink." Called Francis Lederer over—he owns the next place—and Francis was equally impressed. Now Hugh's making plenty of pin money. He's bottling the water and selling it all over Hollywood. Calling it "Herbert's Wo Woo Water."

Cowboy and Indian, 1938 version: In the old days, cowboys pursued Indians over hill and dale, and vice versa. But times have changed. Take Gene Autry, for instance. Gene is at the moment the nation's Number One Cowboy. The Indian, in his case, is George Goodale, half Cherokee, who happens to be Autry's press agent. So every time the present-day cowboy saddles Old Paint, his redskin medicine man goes on the warpath and sees that the item gets in the papers. Heap big change!

the picture had been finished. It seems to me Freddie March had enough sympathy at the end of the story without giving him more by making Stander lower than low. But, once a villain, always a villain and the dirtier the deed, the more virtuous the hero is by comparison."

Nothing seemed to cheer Mr. Donlevy. There wasn't a picture prospect in the world that could lift the gloom from around his handsome head. We reminded him that William Powell was once a villain and that until a year ago that fine actor, Spencer Tracy, was a thorough-going bad character. And look at those two today!

The reminder didn't lift Donlevy from the doldrums. "A mere fluke," he opined. "A coupla mere flukes. If Tracy hadn't been lucky enough to land that role of the priest in 'San Francisco,' he'd probably still be stabbing men in the back—in the movies, of course. That's what gets me! It takes an accident to make them discover that a convincing villain makes a superb hero.

THAT'S ancient history though. Go back to the Rudolph Valentino days. There was a man who went unrecognized as a menace and no one since has made the success in romantic leads that he did when, by a mere chance, he was cast as the hero in 'The Four Horsemen'."

Well, there seemed to be no answer to that one and little to do but wish that the picture Donlevy is making in England will turn out to be his "fluke," since that seems to be what he is looking for.

Pessimistic as Brian was, the visionary Mrs. Donlevy could see a silver lining around his darkest clouds. "Basil Rathbone gets six thousand dollars a week, dear, and for just playing villains," she reminded him.

"Let him," replied her spouse.

"Who did you say—Jack Dempsey?" inquired Victor McLaglen, who had just come over from the adjoining suite.

"No, not your hero," returned Mrs. Donlevy. "You know, Vic is so fond of Dempsey that he spent his four days coming east on the train, preparing to meet him. In fact, all we heard from Hollywood to New York was Jack this and Jack that! Well, last night was the night, our first in town, and what a night!"

"Yeah, wasn't it great," enthused McLaglen, drawing his dressing-gown tightly around him.

"That's Vic, understating everything," interrupted Donlevy. "You know, Vic wouldn't leave Dempsey's to go to the theatre! Well, he did settle for meeting us later at the Stork Club. And when he arrived he was so surprised at seeing us, he inquired, 'Well, fancy seeing you here!'"

"That reminds me, I've got to call Jack. Will you excuse me, folks?" So saying, the mountainous McLaglen made for the phone in the next room.

"To get back to our discussion," commented Donlevy, "the only reason my producers will give for casting me as an undesirable citizen is that I have the face and physique of a heavy. Ability doesn't enter into it at all. And is it my fault that I have big muscles? I guess my brawn is really due to a roommate I once had.

"We were in a show here in New York and, to cut expenses, took an apartment together. Well, this guy used to pick me up bodily and throw me against the wall."

"What were you doing, trying to break a lease?" we wondered.

Mr. Donlevy let that go and continued, "When the wall began to tremble, I suddenly realized my strength! It struck me funny at the time. But, he who laughs last, begins latest or something. Little did I realize that I was in training for a mess of movie menaces."

And very good ones, too, in case you remember Brian's elegant performance in "Come And Get It," the Edward Arnold picture. In fact, that's what did it. For, no sooner was he marched down a muddy street, by the vigilantes, to a waiting noose, than his own company woke up to the fact of his potentialities as a bad man.

"As a matter of fact," Brian remarked, "it was right about then that I first met Dick Arlen. You know he always plays my parts on the screen—the ones I created on the stage. There was to be a broadcast over the radio between us about one of the pictures and I was due at his house to rehearse. I had never met Dick and so, when I walked in we mentally squared off, and were ready for anything to happen. You know professionals! They're touchy!

"Anyway, by the time the radio people arrived we had become such pals that the rehearsal had to be called off 'til the next night. He's swell and I'm glad to see him play the roles, even though it means I can't. At this point I've become resigned to the fate of always kicking nice guys and they might as well toss me a few babies to pinch, because the public has come to think I'm that kind of a guy. I even get a letter now and then telling me what bad news I am, and why! I'm really not a mean gent, and don't like to hurt anyone. If only people would understand that it's my job and I have to do it to the best of my ability, I'm sure they would be more tolerant."

Well, in closing, let us say that, even though it may be small satisfaction to Brian Donlevy, as a menace he is one of our very best actors. And so, we who have the last word wish to remind him of this salient fact, even as Mrs. Donlevy pointed out to him—Basil Rathbone's salary!

in this business, flatter a handsome man, offer him the one thing his wife cannot give him — novelty. Although," smiled Gladys, amused, "Leonard does fare better than most when it comes to novelty! For I am the type actress who lives my parts, even at home. Leonard had Carrie through all of her phases, for breakfast, lunch and dinner. More recently he had Madame X pouring his coffee for him, with hands growing increasingly shaky.

"Anyway, I just wanted to be reassured, that's all. Kind of like a child, I guess, who knows there is nothing hiding in the dark but wants to hear someone say there isn't. So I just sat down with Leonard and we talked it all out. And then I felt all right."

Gladys paused for a moment and then she said, gravely, "You see, for the first time in my life I am really in love. Maturely in love. I hate to say that we are 'adults living in an adult world,' but certainly ours is an adult love. And it's silly for adults to go about being scared of bogey-men or women."

SHE is slim, golden-haired, amber-eyed and chic. She is restless, nervous. She uses her hands when she talks and she talks a great deal, and rapidly. Tears come into her eyes with the same frequency and lack of self-consciousness as do smiles on her lips. When she feels like crying, she just cries. In the course of our conversation she smiled, laughed, cried, dried her eyes, laughed again. Most persons laugh naturally enough. Few weep naturally. Gladys does. No wonder that she is able to draw tears from her audiences when her own come as naturally as showers alternating with sunshine.

Hers is a heart which has been hurt. You can tell that by looking at her eyes. It is a heart which has been hilariously happy, too. It is the heart of a child. Easily hurt. Easily healed. Made happy by small things. She can't resist charity appeals, whether to her purse, or her heart.

Only the other day a little girl from the studio filing department had occasion to go to Miss George's dressing-room. Gladys noticed that the girl, a stranger to her, looked down-at-the-mouth. She asked what troubled her. The girl broke down and admitted that her beau had given her the gate, that she was going crazy. Gladys George let the girl talk her heart out for two solid hours.

The girl said, later, "It was like taking a warm, soothing bath, talking to Miss George. I just knew that she understood. She didn't say much, but she was feeling with me. I just kind of talked myself back to sanity again. She is awfully wise."

The next day a box of white gardenias was delivered to the girl's home. The box was wrapped with white satin ribbon and tied into the knot was a generous bottle of gardenia perfume. "I'm not subtle," Gladys says of herself, "but it seemed to me a lovely way of reminding her that the world is full of a number of things, many of them lovely.

"I'm no beauty," this astonishingly honest woman also says. "Far from it." And she's making no bid for contradiction. She means it.

She reads, with curling lips, specious stories alluding vaguely to her "unhappy childhood." She has heard it rumored that she starved, suffered; that her face was mysteriously injured and remade by plastic surgery; that her life was "saved by a surgeon's knife." "What do they mean?" she asks.

GLADYS' parents were theatrical people. Her father, Sir Arthur Clare, English, well-known Shakespearian actor, was knighted by Edward Seventh. Her mother, a Boston girl, very much in the social circles, became a leading lady on the stage. Gladys, her mother and father travelled all over the United States and Canada. She didn't have what is known as a normal childhood, true. They never stayed long enough in one place for her to go to school regularly. She never had any girl-friends. Her playmates were character men and women, tired juveniles, disillusioned ingenues. Her nursery was backstage. Her doll's cradle was the tray of a theatrical trunk.

Her Dad was, and still is, "a darling." But like most men who are "darlings" was impractical, a dreamer, so that there were what her mother refers to as "reverses," and what Gladys calls "our ups and downs." There were times when she had to wear hand-me-downs, had to make over last year's frocks. What of it? She never went hungry. She never felt sorry for herself. Her whole life was lit, brighter than any Christmas tree, by her ambition to become a great actress.

She never had her face remade by plastic surgery. In 1920, when she first took a very young flier into pictures and played in "Red Hot Dollars," with Charles Ray, she suffered severe burns on one arm and was forced to remain off stage and screen for a year. The burns left a faint scar, which she showed me. They didn't require the surgeon's knife, and they are the sum total of those mysterious injuries.

She said, "I've been rich. I've been poor. I've worn hand-me-downs. I've worn sables. And I've been just as happy one way as the other. No one would want to play the role of Lady Clara Vere de Vere all the time, would they? So, no one should want life to be all one pattern either. I don't. I've had almost every experience there is to have, good and bad."

Gladys deliberately acquired a hard-boiled manner and way of speaking when she was first on the road alone and on the stage in New York. She found it to be her best defense against unpleasant advances. She is the despair of her mother, who will say, with a little despairing laugh, when Gladys is in one of her calling-a-spade-a-spade moods, "My daughter, she's a little peculiar, you know!"

"Mother," laughs Gladys, "lives on a whipped cream cloud, tinted pale pink. I don't."

NO, she doesn't. Gladys and her husband live in a mad manner and love it. Their home life, insists Mrs. Leonard Penn, is nuttier than a Marx Brothers comedy with the Ritz Brothers thrown in. It is not, certainly, the home life of a star, popular version. For they live in a little rented house, this two-years-married couple. Until recently Gladys kept no maid at all. She did all of her own work, cooking, cleaning. When she was working and Leonard was not, he would get her breakfast. When he was working and she was not, she would get his.

"Money won't change us, nor our way of living. We've had money before. It's never been any special fun for me to have it. I can't save, anyway. I give everything away, fur coats, bags, dresses and things. Know what Leonard does now? He locks my cupboards and keeps the keys!"

They never have meals on time. They have no schedules at all. They eat dinner at six if they feel like it, at ten, at midnight or not at all. They care nothing about going to parties or giving them. They have no close friends among the picture people.

Gladys said, "There was one friend when I came to Hollywood this last time, one person who was kind and helpful to me, who didn't look down her nose at me and seem to resent my being here—Jean Harlow. Jean had too many big warmths in her to have any room for petty rivalries. She offered to show me the ropes. All of them. And did. I miss her here . . .

"It's funny, though," she continued, "how differently I used to live when I was on the road, in New York, playing in 'Queer People,' 'Milky Way,' 'Personal Appearance' and the others. My dressing-room was always jammed with people, phones rang constantly. My life was a mad whirl. I was considered dizzy, I'm sure. I know that Leonard didn't feel, at first, that he could keep his finger on me. He knows better now. I've earned his faith in me by deserving it. I've said that women expect too much. They do. We're always wondering whether a man loves us, how he can prove it. Woman's place is in a man's heart. But she's got to make him know that his place is in her heart, too. Everything in life should be fifty-fifty. So should love."

No. 100—Easy to look at, and just as easy to make, this sweater sports bandings of merry turtles and tinkling bell buttons.

WHAT could be more fun than making these colorful mid-winter knits either for yourself or as gifts? Tyrolean and youthful is the fetching sweater, made in the simple stockinette stitch, with crocheted edges of contrasting colors. The dancing turtles, like something from a Disney fantasy, are worked in bright wool, and the buttons are tiny sleighbells. And any skating outfit will be considerably brightened up by the addition of the little white calot, whose tri-colored pompon carries out the color scheme of the embroidery on the tricky knitted scarf which serves as more than a neck-warmer!

Send in your stamped addressed envelope today for free instructions for either or both of these patterns.

No. 102—The little calot is crocheted, its pompons matching the gay flowers embroidered on the knitted scarf. An accessory set that is truly smart.

Happy Relief From Painful Backache

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

made me so ill I couldn't look at her!

"On the other hand, the role I played in 'That Certain Woman,' though small, did give me the chance, I feel, to show that given a chance, I can be more mature. I've been told that I looked different in that part. That cheered me up. Because I didn't change my make-up. I've used the same make-up for years. I didn't do things to my hair. Physically, I was as I always am. Yet people felt, even saw a difference in me. And what encourages me is that whatever that difference was, it came from within. It was just that I was playing a character who had more mature thoughts, more mature emotions. And I hope they came through.

"You see, I'm not a sweet young thing. Matter of fact, I never have been. I've always been old for my age. I've always gone with older people. I've been so much with Mother that, naturally, I've always been a great deal with her friends.

"And I think that, thanks to Mother, I've had a very intelligent bringing up. Mother is French, you know. She had all the conservative ideas and ideals of a French childhood and girlhood. Then she came to America just when the modern age was at its richest and raciest. And she has managed to be a very balanced blend of the old-fashioned mother and the modern mother. She never treated me as a child, intellectually speaking. We always discussed everything as equals. I read everything. Mother took me to France, to Alsace-Lorraine, to visit my grandparents and there I assimilated some of the older, quieter tradition.

ON the other hand, she did keep me closely guarded until I was sixteen. I never went out alone with a boy until I was past sixteen. And so, when I did start to go out I knew pretty thoroughly what things were all about, what to do, what not to do.

"I can certainly say this, too, that a girl growing up in Hollywood, in the studios, in the movies, is every bit as safe, as protected, as a girl can be anywhere. I am wise, I think, we all are, because we have seen so much, so many phases of life, so many kinds of people. But I am most certainly not disillusioned. I am certainly not cynical. If I doubt very much that I could die for love it is not because I don't believe in love, it's because I think that, in the days of the Lily Maid, love was all a woman had to live for as well as die for. Today, there are so many things. Love may be still the most important, certainly the most precious, but it is not all.

"I was a member of what was called Hollywood's youngest set. I'm not a member any longer because," laughed Anita wickedly, "because I don't care to go roller skating any longer! No, seriously, I'm no longer a member because, for one thing, there is no younger set any longer. Most of the old, young crowd are married; Anne Shirley, Tom Brown, Astrid Allwyn; and Paula Stone is engaged. I am about the only one still unmarried or unattached. They are the younger married set now.

I began, "Everyone thought that you and Tom Brown would be . . ."

"I know," said Anita. "So did Tom and I, for that matter and I don't honestly know, even now, why it was that we didn't get married then. Certainly no two youngsters were ever happier together, had more fun together, than Tom and I. Now, I am sure that it is better as it is. I think I am older than Tom now, even though he is older in years than I. A girl in her twenties is older than a boy in his twenties. I feel more mature. I have an idea that when I do marry I should marry a man quite a few years older than I am.

"And I do want to get married, of course. I hope that I won't fall in love for another two years. I have so much work I want to do, so much I want to accomplish. But it's ridiculous to make statements or prophecies about love and marriage. I may tell you that I won't get married for two years and walk out of here and fall in love within the hour and elope to Yuma tonight. Unlikely, but possible. I can only say that I hope I won't want to get married for two years.

"I am so ambitious, I often think that if, before I die, I can do just one scene as Katharine Cornell or Helen Hayes would do it, I would be content.

"And I have my other career, too, my harp. I work quite as hard, quite as conscientiously at that as I do at my work in the studio. I think it's bad business to put all of your eggs into one basket. I believe in balance, something on this side, something on that. I balance my personal life, too. I mean, I have friends among the picture people. I know every one of them, of course. I also have friends who have nothing to do with pictures. One of my best friends is a girl who is studying to become a designer. Others of my friends are musicians, still others are just girls who stay at home. I have a very just-girl life at home. Mother and I have a pleasant house, rented. I have my own room. I have my girl friends in to spend the night with me. All that sort of usual, conventional thing. We talk about pictures at home but we also talk about music and the Russian flyers and the new books and Aimee Semple McPherson and new recipes and patterns of linoleum for the kitchen floor.

SO, I am not only not a sweet young thing but I am, also, a veteran. I have been in pictures, in Hollywood, since I was seven years old. I grew up in Hollywood, I went to school in Hollywood. I almost learned to talk in pictures. Long," laughed Anita, "before pictures talked themselves!

"I made my first picture, 'The Sixth Commandment,' with Neil Hamilton when I was five. I played in 'The Music Master.' I did such pictures as 'Millie,' with Helen Twelvetrees, 'Our Betters,' with Constance Bennett, 'The Most Precious Thing in Life,' 'Are We Civilized?' 'Swan Song' and lots of others. Later I did 'Madame Du Barry,' with Dolores del Rio, 'The Firebird' (in which, oh goody, goody, I played a girl murderess!), and then was given my contract with Warner Brothers. And here I have been ever since. At the moment I am being another sweet young thing, well, rather sweet and very young in 'Tovarich,' with Claudette Colbert and Charles Boyer.

"Now, this being a veteran at twenty-one is, so to speak, a two-edged sword. There are assets. There are, also, liabilities. The assets are that I know what it is all about. But all of it. I can't ever get the big head. That is a sudden disease. I can't ever be impressed. I can't be flattered, frightened, disillusioned. I should, and I think I do, avoid many of the mistakes others have made. Because I have been able to watch those others and profit by their mistakes.

"I have watched the results of dissipation, little heads that grew too big, too much money made too fast, overnight successes. I have lived through the lives and times of Valentino, Wally Reid, Barbara La Marr, John Gilbert, so many others. I have seen ingenues come and go, before I was out of my teens. And I am still here. I have lived through the silents and came into the talkies naturally, as a child who is at first inarticulate and then learns to speak. Those are the assets. I am not in danger of being spoiled.

"The liabilities are, that they know me too well, have known me too long, at my age! And because they knew me as a child actress they cannot outgrow my childhood! They are still thinking of me as the little tot in patent leather slippers. Also, there are those who do not like to be reminded that they worked with me when I was little enough to sit on their laps! Grown up, I can be an unpleasant reminder of the passing of time.

"And so, although I have all the weapons in my hands, experience, familiarity with my medium, I have to fight double strength, to be allowed to use those weapons.

"I do see signs of progress, as I said. I imagine that within the next three to four years I'll be given the things to do I should be doing right now. That's another problem, because three years from now I will have outgrown (I hope) the things I should be doing now. Not because my looks will have changed, women today look about the same from sixteen to sixty, but because I will have changed inwardly. I seem to be always five years ahead, emotionally, of what I am given to do. With one or two exceptions.

"I should like to do the sort of things Loretta Young has done, is doing. If I could sort of parallel her career, the progress she has made, that is as nearly the way I'd like things to work out as I can tell you."

Charles Boyer, across the Green Room, beckoned Anita Louise. She said, "I must go now and do a little 'Tovariching' in my best sweet-young-thing manner."

I said goodbye to the lovely Louise and to all of my preconceived ideas about her. She had slain them, every one, not with her brains but with the even brighter weapon of her honesty.

Knowing that they would be apart on their first Christmas, both of them had started propping up their chins weeks before. Each, unknown to the other, spent hours in planning, getting and wrapping scads of gag gifts, to try to inspire smiles on a lonely Christmas morning. One example: In a large and handsome frame, Ann sent Roger the last thing he would want underneath his Christmas tree. A photograph of an ex-sweetheart of his.

They did manage to be together for New Year's, bad flying weather or not. She had eight days off. She used one of them to fly east, six of them to be with Roger, one to fly back. During their six days together they had, for the first time in their married life, more than a speaking acquaintance with each other.

FINALLY, late in the spring, Roger had a chance to do some of the connubial commuting. A week between orchestra engagements. A week during which, to see Ann in the daytime, he had to sit on a movie set, watching someone else make love to his wife. The same maddening thing happened a couple of months later, when he had another week between engagements.

Then, at last, Ann managed to get six consecutive weeks off. And during two of those weeks, she had the world's worst cold.

"But this trip, Poppy (that's what I call him) almost had time to decide whether or not he liked the way Mommy (that's what he calls me) squeezed the toothpaste. I almost had time to decide whether or not I liked the way he used both of our towels, not just his. We almost had time to start making some of the adjustments to each other, and to married life, that all newlyweds have to make.

"That's the most hectic thing about this hectic first year. We haven't had the chance to be normal newlyweds, sharing everyday life. By the end of the first year, most young married couples know all of each other's faults and virtues and habits and thoughts. They have either adjusted themselves to life together, or they've found out that the only adjustment they will ever have is maladjustment.

"But we've had so little time with each other, and at such erratic intervals, that we haven't been able to settle down and discover what day-after-day life might be like. Every time we've been together, we've felt as if we were on a stolen holiday. People on holidays aren't down-to-earth. They're up in the clouds.

"We haven't had a chance to find out if we could have a happy homelife, because we haven't shared a home except on Roger's two very brief visits here. We've shared hotel suites, instead. We've sat across from each other at breakfast tables, and luncheon tables, and dinner tables, but the tables haven't been our own, and the food hasn't been from our own kitchen. We've always been surrounded by hordes of people. We've never really been alone together, day after day, evening after evening. We haven't had any real test of our love. Separation isn't a test for love. Not our kind. And brief holidays aren't, either.

"I live the same kind of life now as I did before I was married. Do all the same things, go out with the same people, order the same meals, have the same habits. Roger, likewise. We haven't had to change. We haven't had to make allowances for anybody but our respective selves.

"Perhaps that's the best possible state of affairs, as long as we can't be together except at irregular intervals. We aren't brooding about our separations. Both of us are too busy. Roger has the orchestra to lead, and new numbers to arrange and rehearse. I have acting to do, and lines to learn. I've had to make six pictures this past year. That's too many. I'm going to put up a fight to do only three next year. There's a possibility that Roger may be out on the Coast with his orchestra, but wherever he is, we're going to have more time together!

"I don't know what the solution will be. If Roger went back to acting, and he's a grand actor, the solution would be simple. Automatically, he'd be here in Hollywood. But he has given up acting for keeps, he says. Music is in his blood and there's no telling where he'll be from year to year, from now on. We both hope that it will be on the Coast, where I'll be until this career business gets out of my blood. I've worked to come this far. I want to go a little farther before I stop.

CERTAINLY, ours isn't an ideal arrangement or a happy arrangement. Sometimes I feel pretty violent about it all. Other times, I'm philosophical about our separations. Most of the time, I don't feel either violent or philosophical. Just static. Waiting for the future to catch up with us. It isn't much fun.

"I think I've always been lonely. All my life, I've always done things by myself. It used to seem natural. Now it doesn't. I'm conscious of loneliness. I've never felt close to anyone, really, except Roger. And I've had so little opportunity to be close to him this first year.

"But," she shook off her moodiness, "don't think I haven't acquired domestic impulses. I have an insane urge now to own a home, a real home that will be permanent. I have my eye on a little early American house, crispy and white and secluded. But I think the people know how badly I want it. They're asking a fabulous price.

"Yes, I am buying a house. Not we. Roger may be living in Hollywood eventually, but I'm sure I'll be living here, at least for a few years. And that being the case, it isn't fair for him to share in the buying. As long as we have separate lives, and separate incomes, we ought to keep our expenses separate, too, I feel. That will give us both a chance to save for the children.

"Oh, didn't I tell you? I'm planning to have a baby, late in 1939. A boy. It must be a boy. I'm going to be particular about that." She smiles. And her smile has nothing of rebellion or irony or wistfulness in it. She says: "I must tell you what Roger said when he called last night. He said, 'Here I've been married a whole year, and I'm still in love with my wife. Stuffy and old-fashioned, don't you think?'"

"I'm all stuffy, too," Ann added. Which doesn't speak so badly for that hectic first year!

who knows!"

I said to Boyer, "Let's play a one-sided game of Truth. You tell me about yourself. It's sort of blunt, the game of Truth. If you pretty it up it's no good. So, if you will forgive my credulity, are you conceited? If not, why not? And especially, how not? How do you prevent conceit from enveloping you like a fungus?"

Mr. Boyer smiled, that quiet smile which is in his dark eyes as well as on his lips. He said, "But if you will reason a little, you will realize how little all that sort of thing has to do with me. They do not know me in the least, you see, the people who ask for autographs, crowd about me and the other picture people, at premieres, in the cafes. They do not know what I am really like. How could they? Therefore, they cannot really know whether they like me or do not like me. If it is my screen appearance they are attracted to, I can say only this. If I were a doctor or a lawyer, looking just as I look now, I would have come out of the theatre and no one would have turned a head to look at me. So, with a little reasoning, there is no place for conceit. It comes, the attention, only because I am a public character, publicized. It has nothing to do with what I am.

"And for me, there could be no excuse to be conceited. I have worked for quite a long time. I have known some success in Paris. (I remember Maurice Chevalier saying of Boyer, "He could have had any woman in Paris, any woman in France. They were mad for him, all of them, everywhere." And when a man says that about another man!) I have come to Hollywood before," Boyer continued, "and I have known no success at all. I have gone back to Paris, more than once, thinking that the screen was not to be for me. With me it has been a series of sips, not the one sudden draught to go to the head. I would not blame those who become stars overnight for getting the big head. That is understandable and forgivable. I admire young Taylor very much because he has remained unspoiled and natural when, in one year, with no theatre behind him to prepare him, he became the tops. With me, it has been different."

"How do you rate yourself as an actor?"

Mr. Boyer shook his head. He said, "To say that I play all types, as an actor should be able to do, would sound too pretentious. I can say that I like best to play dramatic parts. I consider that I have the face, the build, the personality best suited to dramatic parts. Not that I dislike the comedy. It is the most difficult to do of all things. But I am more at home in drama. Most of us are limited by our physical type. So am I. I could not play the fat Falstaff, I could not play Henry the Eighth, or one of the Louis. It is not only a matter of the make-up. It is a matter of the man. I could not be those men."

"Have you a Napoleonic complex?" was my next query.

"No," said Boyer again, "I am one actor who never wanted to play Napoleon, on stage or screen. Mr. Thalberg asked me to play the part well over a year ago. I begged, then, to be excused. I did not want to play a character about which there are so many preconceived ideas. It was too difficult an undertaking.

"And it is by far the most difficult part I have ever played. In every way but one—Garbo! She made it delightful on the set because she is delightful to work with. She is easy to work with. She is stimulating. She is generous. She is unbegrudging about everything. I had, of course, no fear of working with her. We had met before. But the experience was even more worth while than I had thought it would be. She has a face upon which the least thought, the least emotion, is written.

"Everything went so well, so without hitch, or temperament or upsets of any kind that there are really no anecdotes to tell about it. I am very bad, anyway, at telling stories. I am not successful as a raconteur. I would never do," laughed Boyer, "travelling in your club cars with your travelling salesmen. I would not have the stories to swap with them. So, it was a happy time. Very friendly and very much fun. Miss Garbo likes to retire to her dressing-room between scenes, at the luncheon hour. But I do not find that strange or unfriendly, for so do I. When the day's work is done, she does what you call 'scram,' as you know. But so, again, do I. While she is working, she is sociable, friendly, and there is no more to be expected.

"It may interest you, the way we arrived at my make-up for Napoleon. We took a death mask of Napoleon and the studio then had made a mask of my face. From the death mask to my face the transition, after many experiments, was made. A very slight transition. The producers felt that the fans should be able to recognize me, that Bonaparte should not completely obliterate Boyer! And so we did very little, really. We changed my nose, not very much. We lengthened my chin.

"I carried my head like this for the five and a half months we were in production" —and he illustrated by ducking his chin into his collar and holding it there— "and I have now," he laughed, "to use shadows to take away the chin I worked so hard to get! I keep forgetting to hold the chin up.

"I have eliminated, in the picture, some of the more famous Napoleonic poses. I do not stand with arms folded on my chest. I do hold my hands in back of me and flip my coat-tails, but that is because it is a natural gesture for any man wearing those costumes—there are no pockets in them. I did a great deal of research, read many books on Napoleon, especially on Napoleon, the man. Because, in 'Conquest,' you see him much more as the lover than as the soldier."

"Do you consider that you have any one outstanding quality in your work? Almost every actor suggests one quality, one emotion. Gable, for instance, suggests virility; Spencer Tracy, a rugged, rock-of-ages strength, and yours?"

"Sadness," laughed Mr. Boyer (his laughter is low, muted, in key with his speaking voice and with his personality). He seemed amused at the question, more amused at his own answer. "I think, perhaps, I express sadness better than I do any other emotion."

"What is your greatest virtue?"

MR. BOYER thought and thought. He said finally, "I suppose I may say that I try not to cause inconvenience to others if I can possibly help it. I try not to have little annoying habits at home, whistling to myself, things like that. I try, always, to be punctual. I am always punctual on the set. I know my lines. I just try to avoid irritating others. I suppose that is my best virtue in private life and in my work."

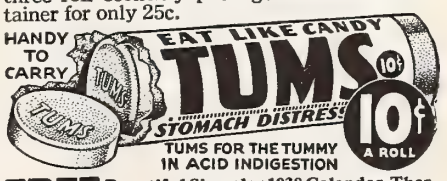
"Your greatest fault?"

"As an actor," smiled Charles Boyer, "or as a man?"

"Well," I floundered, thereby losing the chance of a lifetime, "as an actor?"

"There is a very large selection to choose from. I am not pausing now because I am the perfect man, without faults, but because I have so many. I think my worst fault is my very annoying habit of always rehearsing over and over the scene we have just shot. Instead of rehearsing the scene which is to come, which I should be doing, naturally, I go crying over spilt milk. I am worrying over something which is done and cannot be done again. I make myself and those about me very unhappy. I cause the very trouble I try to avoid. I cannot seem to correct this vice.

"This very morning I have gone over and over the first of the day's scenes of 'Tovarich.' It is all in the box but I keep going over it, adding bits of business, tormenting myself. I have a faculty for torturing myself. My other vice," said Boyer, lighting his tenth cigarette in as many minutes, "is that I am what you call a chain smoker, as you may have noticed. I am an endless chain of cigarettes, especially when I am working. I smoke less when I am at home. But that is because, perhaps, I am more active with my hands at home. We play a great deal of tennis, ping pong. Yet I am happiest when I am working. I feel less nervous then. I am healthiest when I am working, always."



"Are you temperamental?" the questions continued.

"Not outwardly," Mr. Boyer said. "If you mean do I have flare-ups, fits of rage when I lose my collar, walk off sets, make scenes not called for in my scripts, no. No, but it might be better for me if I did. I would then get things better out of my system."

"Are you the modern or the old-fashioned husband? You know what I mean."

"I am not sure what you mean," Charles Boyer said, smiling, "but I think you mean how do I feel about my wife, about whether she should work or stay at home. I think I am the modern husband. I have no objection to my wife working if she wishes to work. I believe it is better for a woman to be busy with some work than to be busy only with her thoughts. There are many Satans glad to find mischief for the idle thoughts of idle women. I am perhaps old-fashioned in believing that when children come they should be the work to keep the woman busy. I should like to have children."

"Would you call yourself, well, domesticated?" (I hesitated because it did sound so ridiculous, asking that question of Boyer —in evening clothes, very smart, smouldering dark eyes seeming almost to burn the wreathing smoke away.)

HE said, "Half-and-half. I like to spend time at home, but not all the time. I am not anything of the recluse. I like to give dinners at home for our friends. I like also to go to dinners occasionally, at the homes of friends. I like to dance, occasionally. My wife likes very much to dance and so we do, now and then.

"I am not, what you call in America, a good mixer. I grow to know my friends rather slowly, carefully. I believe that a friendship, to be real, requires time. I name my real friends only among those who were my friends before I came, the last time, to Hollywood. People I meet now, people who are very kind and flattering and congenial, I cannot say are my friends. Yes, I am of a cynical turn of mind. I do not take people on faith. I realize that there are many of my acquaintances today who, if they thought I might be visiting them to ask for a job, would not be at home to me.

"But I am a social animal, or do I say a sociable animal? I have no desire to go back to the land. I like cities. I like noise and excitement. I like life and to be a part of life."

I said, "Have you any special fear of anything?"

"Sickness," said Mr. Boyer, "and old age. I am not afraid of death. That is finality. I cannot concern myself with what cannot be helped. But I am afraid of sickness and of old age, which is physical humiliation."

"Are you," as the shadow of the assistant director loomed, "clothes-conscious?"

"For myself, I should not say that I am exactly clothes-conscious. I like good clothes. And I am conscious, I should say I am observant, of clothes. Particularly," smiled Mr. Boyer, "observant of women's clothes. I notice them very much. I always know when my wife wears something new, a gown, a hat, a wrap, even a pair of shoes or a jewel. I have trained myself to this. It is one of the ways to be a successful husband."

"Are you particular about food? Fussy?"

"Yes. Very much. But we have at home a French cook. She knows what I like and how I like it and so there is no difficulty."

"Are you musical?"

"I have played the violin," laughed Charles, "but that is, fortunately, past. It sounds too pretentious, perhaps, to say that I love Chopin. But I am, also, very fond of modern American music."

The hovering assistant director hove right into the dressing-room. He said, "They are ready, Mr. Boyer."

Smoothness Is the Word for Beauty

sour cream. Slice the beets thinly, sprinkle with a little salt and pepper, and add one heaping teaspoonful of the cream. The results are far from dreary, if you like tasty foods.

That's another thing which seems to keep plump folks from dieting. People who like flavorsome, highly seasoned foods declare they'd rather not eat at all than go on any sort of plain, drab, unseasoned diet. Most diatribes on diet tell you to cut down to almost nothing on seasonings for two reasons: tasty things tempt you to eat more. And seasonings do stimulate the gastric juices and make you hungry. But can't we be reasonable about this thing? Haven't you enough will power to stick to one moderate serving of a thing, no matter how good it tastes? Leave the table a little bit hungry. That's the first rule for losing weight.

These seasonings are harmful to neither fat or thin, if used in moderation: celery salt (in fact it's good for you), curry, grated onion, garlic, bay leaf, cloves, horse radish, mint, lemon juice, paprika and pimiento. Salt and black pepper should be used in strict moderation.

Tips for the underweight: you should have a big serving of two starches a day. Hot cereal, often with bananas or figs and sugar and cream in the morning. Potatoes, rice or noodles at dinner. Don't go in for fried potatoes, however. Have them boiled, creamed, mashed, baked. Fried foods, though fattening, true enough, are also hard to digest. So are the very rich sweets.

Corn is a fine, fattening vegetable and, of course, here it is winter and no corn on the cob. But you can have a corn pudding, which is simply delish and which I don't need to tell the southern gals about. However, northern, eastern and western girls, you take two cups of corn kernels. Get the dry-packed canned corn. Two eggs, lightly beaten. Two and a half cups of cream or rich milk, scalded. And two tablespoons of melted butter. Add the cream to the butter, then the eggs, then the corn, stir well, pour into a buttered baking dish and pop into a moderate oven. Cook till a nice pudding consistency.

I can't spend much longer on the diet part of this effusion, because I wanta say something about make-up and clothes, but first let me give you a trick for dolling up that despised green, spinach, and then I'm through.

IF you get a kick out of taking some homely greens and making them tasty, you'll not find this any trouble. Get about three pounds of fresh spinach—more wouldn't matter. Wash it. Did you know that it's much more efficient to wash spinach in hot water, with a spray, and it doesn't hurt the spinach? Try it. Cook the spinach as you ordinarily would. Then pass it through a sieve—that's the boring part of the recipe. Take three eggs, beat them well, add half a pint of cream or rich milk, a stick of melted butter and the puréed spinach. Turn it all into a buttered baking dish and set the dish in a pan of hot water to bake in the oven. It takes about twenty minutes. When it begins to look puffy on top, it's done. Sprinkle generously with grated cheese and run it in the oven another moment for the cheese to brown. It's good.

And now, by golly, that's enough about eating. If you wish to be a smooth-looking person, you know the skin must be good and well-tended, the hair likewise, the nails never neglected and all the rest of it. I'm not going over the fundamentals again. However, there are many tricks of the beauty trade that one needs to know.

About powder, now. Have you ever tried using two shades, treating one of them as rouge? To experiment in the least expensive way, get two ten-cent boxes of a good powder from the dime store—one in the shade you usually wear, the other in a dark shade. If you're unattractively prominent where you wish you weren't (like around the nose), try using the darker powder on the nose, the lighter powder everywhere else. If your chin has a tendency to slide away, try a lighter powder on the chin. In general, let me warn you against using a too-light powder. In the summer, we are all pretty careful about this. But come cold weather, we think it's okay to go back to the pale rachels and flesh tints. As a matter of fact, a light powder plus cold weather will make one look blue around the gills and mauve around the nose.

Eyes, now. An awful lot can be done about eyes in the quest of smoothness. You know about plucking eyebrows—only the tiny stray hairs underneath, and most judicious pruning if your brows grow too close together. Heavy brows are fashionable, so except for the above two points, don't pluck. Very heavy brows should be brushed up, and then brushed into line with a touch of brilliantine. Thin, scraggly brows should be made up thisaway: Instead of drawing a hard, unnatural line on them with pencil or dabbing futilely at them with mascara, put a little cold cream or vaseline in the palm of your hand. Into it rub quite a lot of soft eye pencil or mascara. It's messy, but you'll find that a brush very delicately dipped into this oily substance and gently feathered across your brows will make them look more natural. For brows which are light, but thick enough for practical purposes, mascara is the most helpful coloring agent.

For gala occasions, experiment with blue, green, or the mascaras with a bit of gold or silver in them. If you're lucky enough to own a gold or silver evening gown, mascara to match, judiciously used, and a touch of brown or green eyeshadow should have enough smoothness, not to mention sex appeal, to knock the male sex all of a heap.

THE smoothness of your hair depends upon you. If you're handy with the bobbie pin, the water-wave comb, the curling iron, the waveset lotion—well, you can do anything you please with your hair. You can have it page boy, banged, rolled up here and there in fascinating swirls and curls. Some people have this knack. Others struggle and slave and come out looking as if they'd combed their hair with an egg beater. They must do one of two things: stick to the simplest of coiffures that is becoming to them, or be prepared to spend money and time at a good beauty parlor as often as they need attention. And no putting it off till next day or next week because you'd rather go to the movies or have spent all your dough, either. Not if you want to look smooth.

Personally, I'd take the simple hair-do. First, because it saves money which can be put into good-looking clothes. Second, because you won't have stickum put on your hair when you don't want it. And third, because very few hairdressers have individuality. Most every gal that depends upon the beauty parlor for hair smartness looks pretty much like every other gal.

The chief secret of being a smooth person "all over"—make-up hair and clothes—is, once again, simplicity. Never clutter up your effects. One detail of your costume (in addition to its cut and fabric) is all that's necessary to command attention. Do you remember, in "Stella Dallas," when Anne Shirley was trying on the party dress? Barbara Stanwyck wanted to put an artificial flower at the belt—"to give it a little snap," she said. "Oh, no, Mama! Not with all the lovely handmade ruffles." Stella thought her daughter "just as plain as an old shoe, like her pa." But daughter was right. No one can tell you exactly when a bit of trimming or accessory is right or wrong and why. You've got to learn it yourself. A safe rule to follow is, "When in doubt, don't."

Another time-worn rule for smoothness is that one about buying the best you possibly can instead of as many as you possibly can. Kay Francis declares she doesn't care a great deal about clothes. Yet, there she was last year, with her picture in all the papers as one of America's best-dressed women—certainly the best-dressed woman in pictures, both on screen and off. Kay Francis buys almost all her things in Paris. Sure, she can afford it, you say, and what's that got to do with me? Well, even though Kay doesn't want a lot of clothes and cares not one whit for fancy things, when she does buy a suit or gown or hat, something instinctively fastidious in her makes her want it just right. If she isn't dressed in the very best, she'd just as soon be comfortable in old slacks and sweater. You can't jaunt to Paris for something to cover your bones, and you needn't. But you can choose the good rather than the showy and sacrifice a yearning for variety for the sake of one good suit or a black dress that is really sumpin'.

Merle Oberon is a lovely thing. American fans aren't nearly as warmed up to her as they might be if she didn't have to keep jumping over to England every now and then. However, we do like her much better, now, as her own self— a nice English girl with lovely eyes and soft dark hair and a sweet manner, than we did as a phoney Oriental type. She was perhaps more sexy and alluring, in her earlier pictures, but she wasn't natural, and we knew it. And that, my dears, is just another example of the other rule for smoothness: be yourself. Don't try to change your external, physical type in any radical way.

Well, what about Carole Lombard? Do you remember the Lombard of less than five years ago? She was a clothes-horse. She was darn near a dizzy blonde. Then came the change. Carole made "Twentieth Century" with John Barrymore and ever since then she's been a personality—a steadily improving, interesting actress—and a sure-fire comedian. Her clothes are elegant, her appearance is always smart, sure, trig and trim instead of being slightly dizzy. What gave Carole her boost along the road to being a more intriguing, smooth individual? A good break and a chance to do something that no one thought she could ever do. That's what did it. Nowadays Carole gets first crack at good stories and her salary has soared sky-high.

It's not too much for you to hope that you'll get a change, and a break and a chance one of these days. But be ready for it when it comes. If you've got what it takes, you'll get your break—or make one for yourself, never fear!

Plea for Real-Life Pictures

I didn't just sit and watch "Dead End" for the fun of it—I lived it. Just as surely as if I'd been one of them, I felt the terrible, mocking contempt that those poor kids felt for the idle rich who were continuously flaunted before their eyes. I, too, knew the awful bitterness of the gangster, Baby Face, who came back to the place of his birth to find some trace of the love he once knew, and found instead only hatred, disappointment and death. I, too, felt the weariness and the heartaches of his old mother who had given him birth, but who had grown to despise him.

I take off my hat to Hollywood for producing the most realistic, honest-to-goodness human vehicle I've ever witnessed on the screen. Let's have more pictures like this. In other words, let's have more life as it really is.—Marie Walker, Trenton, N. J.

Taylor Talk

Someone mentions Taylor,
My face turns very grim.
"Find someone else for gossip,
Anyone but him."

He's pasted on the billboards,
His name's on every tongue,
The girls' hearts go much faster,
Because he is so young.

Then people look disgusted,
When I say I hate him so.
"He'll do me no good anyway,
With Barbara on the go."

But when no one is looking,
My magazines come down.
My fingers turn to Taylor's page
And then I go to town.

I look at all his photographs
And stare into space and sigh,
There's not a better man on earth
I to myself say I.

So no one knows the honest truth,
Or will ever get the chance
To dream of what I'd ever do
If he asked me for a dance.
—Thelma Peterson, Bayside, Long Island, N. Y.

Scarlett O'Hopkins?

Why all the to-do over who's going to play Scarlett O'Hara? Why not give the movie fans a treat and show us a new face that we can think of as Scarlett—not an actress who stamps every role she plays with her own personality.

If a new actress were chosen and no advance ballyhoo spread about her, think what a sensation the picture would cause. Curiosity about the unknown, if nothing else, would draw people to see it. Everyone has his own idea of Scarlett, but putting someone like Miriam Hopkins or Paulette Goddard (she seemed to be "it" once) in the role, we all know how either one of them would play it and some of us just hate to see how right we are.—Carter Harrison, Hopewell, Va.

Star Doubles

I wonder if other fans ever indulge in the thankless but amusing whimsy of keeping an ever-searching eye open for people who resemble movie celebrities? Why, I often roam through the five-and-ten just to get a gimpse of the clerk who is so much like Ann Harding that customers stand and gape in awe. I have two dear friends who resemble Katharine Hepburn and Connie Bennett, respectively. I could rave on, but after all you wouldn't be interested in local doubles whom you've never seen, so I'll limit my mental comparisons to the screen:

Jane Bryan favors the Nancy Carroll of earlier days.

Julie Haydon reminds me of Ann Harding.

Andrea Leeds is a lot like Olivia De Havilland.

Frances Farmer could be Madge Evans' sister.

Helen Mack is another Frances Dee.

Dorothy Lamour could "stand-in" for the Duchess of Windsor.

Doris Weston, thanks to Warners' "substitution" department, was chosen to look like Ruby Keeler, which she does—and to take Ruby's place, which she doesn't!—Mary Padgett, Quincy, Ill.

juice and rind of 1 lemon
1 tablespoon butter
rich pastry for large 2-crust pie

Place raisins and cranberries in saucepan. Add sugar and boiling water. Cook together five minutes. Mix flour, cornstarch, salt and spices. Add to beaten egg and beat well. Combine with a little of the hot fruit mixture, then add slowly to remaining fruit mixture in saucepan. Continue cooking five minutes longer, stirring constantly. Cool. Add lemon juice and rind and turn into pie plate lined with unbaked pastry. Dot with butter. Moisten edge of lower crust with a little cold water. Lay top crust over filling. Trim off surplus pastry around edge of pie plate. Press and flute edge with floured fingers or tines of a fork. Cut slits in a fancy pattern in top crust to let steam escape. Bake in hot oven (425° F.) fifteen minutes. Reduce heat to moderate (350° F.) and bake ten to fifteen minutes longer or until crust is delicately browned. If a shiny top crust is desired, brush crust before baking with egg white slightly beaten with one tablespoon water. A lattice crust may also be used instead of an entire top crust.

THAT combination of fruits sounds intriguing, doesn't it? And the recipe as outlined, step by step, if followed in the same orderly fashion (measure accurately, mix as directed and don't cheat!), is really a cinch.

By the way, if you're looking for a perfect fruit cake to have on hand when company drops in, here's a grand recipe that Dorothy's mother—from Alabama, suh—raved about. It's not one of those cakes that you have to make up 'way ahead of time either to let it "ripen." No, you can eat this one the day it's baked, a fact which sounded so good to me that I tested it forthwith with most gratifying results.

Here 'tis:

TODAY'S FRUIT CAKE

2¼ cups sifted flour
½ teaspoon nutmeg
1 teaspoon cinnamon
1 teaspoon salt
½ cup butter or other shortening
1 cup sugar
1 egg, beaten
1 cup strained unsweetened apple sauce*
1 teaspoon soda
¼ cup water
½ cup seedless raisins
¼ cup finely cut pitted dates
¼ cup finely cut candied pineapple
¼ cup finely cut candied cherries
¼ cup finely cut candied lemon peel
½ cup chopped nut meats

Sift flour, measure. Add spices and salt and sift again. Cream shortening thoroughly with the sugar. Add beaten egg. Add apple sauce. Dissolve soda in the water and add to apple sauce mixture alternately with the flour mixture. Just before adding the last of the flour mixture stir into it the fruits and nut meats. Turn into two small, greased loaf pans and bake forty-five minutes in a moderate oven (350° F.).

*If sweetened apple sauce is used, then cut down slightly on amount of sugar.

We dropped into Adrian's studio recently to witness his latest fashion show. There were cocktails and twelve gowns, all with titles, ranging from "Where's the Moon?" to "Don't Like Parties." We don't know much about fashions, but we suspect that the most admired gown was one called "Second Wife." It was sophisticated and quite decolleté, and when a model came forth with it we detected a low, masculine whistle in the row behind us.

With but three or four days work left on "True Confession," Carole Lombard phoned the studio that she was ill and would need a couple of days rest. "Okay," said the studio. That afternoon someone saw her out riding with Clark Gable. So the studio phoned her, told her about the incident, and asked her how she felt. "Okay," said Carole. Next morning she was back at work.

The Children's Corner: The other evening, come praying time, Mrs. Dick Arlen was having trouble with her offspring. "If you don't say your prayers nicely," she warned him, "you'll never be a great man." "That's all right," said young Mr. Arlen, "I only want to be an actor, anyway."

Aren't the Stars Wonderful? Dept: Over at Paramount there's a foreign importation, Isa Miranda, for whom the studio has great hopes. First step in the career of a great hope is publicity, and the publicity purveyors forward this about Miss Miranda. Recently she was shown a selection of portrait pictures which had been taken of her a few days before. Miss Miranda destroyed them all. "They are too beautiful," she said. "I want the public to love me for my characterizations." Ho hum.

Ronald Colman, along with Herman the Hermit, has a Hollywood reputation of being something of a recluse. He is seldom seen around and he practically never attends parties. His romantic interest has remained constant, however. The young lady is still Benita Hume, and of late they've been stepping out a bit. . . . Their favorite haunt is Ted Snyder's, the musician's hangout. Snyder's is a private club, membership being restricted only to those who have the price of a pair of highballs.

Interesting to note the recent change in Nelson Eddy. A year ago, Nelson was the coldest and most aloof baritone you could shake a candenza at. On the set he kept to himself, and visitors went away feeling he preferred his own company to any other. But today, all that is changed. Mr. E. is friendly and affable, and even takes time out to have himself some fun. One evening, for instance, he made the rounds of the night spots with Woody Van Dyke and Frank Morgan. At the last spot, strictly a joint, Nelson got up and favored the customers with a couple of songs. So now everyone wonders who gets the credit for the defrosting process. We say it's a toss-up between Director Van Dyke and Charlie McCarthy, whose radio hecklings have done plenty for Nelson's popularity.

Speaking of McCarthy reminds us of W. C. Fields, whom we visited on the set of "The Big Broadcast" the other day. Watching Fields is always a pleasure because no one, including the director, knows what he's going to say. Scripts mean nothing to him. If he thinks of a better line in the middle of a scene, he uses it. Incidentally, the real reason he dropped out of that radio show was that he was dissatisfied with the material provided for him. You've got to be good to follow Master McCarthy.

Now that "Women Have a Way" is finished, Miriam Hopkins can sit back and relax. For one scene in the picture she spent three days in a bathtub. The gentlemen of the press evinced considerable interest in the picture during that period, but Miss H., unaccustomed to public bathing, had the set closed to visitors. For other scenes, when she plays an arty young lady in Greenwich Village, she had to spend two hours every morning having her hair de-curled into a straight bob. But now it's all over, Miriam's hair is curly once more and she's gone back to her old hobby of bathing by herself.

Gracie Allen vigorously denies the slurs on her sobriety which popped up at a recent party. Gracie showed up at the affair with an orchid perched in her hair, and people began to talk. Gracie says she knew the orchid was there all the time, in fact, she put it there and considered it very stylish. And Gladys Swarthout will back her up, because Gladys started the fad herself over a year ago. So there.

Out on the "Bad Man of Brimstone" set there's a group of men who call themselves the Old Timers' Club. Most of them have been in pictures since pix first started. They work only when a chance comes in the movies, and mostly in western pix. Never shave, but they do wash occasionally. Have a club house downtown, upstairs in a dirty room on Main Street. Never have more than two dollars in the treasury and spend their meetings just talking about old times.

When Bing Crosby was coming through Texas not long ago on the train, the conductor remarked to the engineer. "We've a famous personality on the train today. It's Bing Crosby!" "Who's that?" asked the engineer. "Him?" gasped the conductor, "Why, Bing's that famous movie lover." "Well, won't make any difference in Texas," said the other, "this is a Gable state."

While visiting the set of "Accidents Will Happen," we talked to William Hoover, who has a role in the picture. William wasn't feeling any too happy, since he'd been getting bum breaks all through the day. Hoover looks enough like Edward Arnold to be his twin brother, so Director Clemens would say in every scene, "Sorry, you'll have to move to the background, Hoover. We can't have it assumed that Edward Arnold's playing an extra in this picture." The likeness does him good, of course, in that he's Arnold's stand-in, when the star is working, but Hoover would also like a career of his own.

Isa Miranda, the lovely Italian gal, was going to be interviewed by a reporter from the East. They met for the first time on the set, and the newspaperman, speaking slowly and distinctly, in deference to Isa's limited knowledge of English, told the star that he had come all the way from Philadelphia just to interview her. "Ah," said Isa, smiling graciously, "but you must not let that embarrass you. Not with me, please. For to me, you speak the English very nicely."

Rosemary and Priscilla (Pat) Lane are buying a big home out in the valley right near Lola's place. They'll live there with their mother, who's a combination mother-secretary-confidante and general amuser. Cora is such fun that the beauteous Lane gals don't care whether they go out or not at night, they have such a swell time just sitting around at home. Jack Warner, Jr., incidentally, has given up that cute USC co-ed for Pat's sake.

Is Martha Raye burnt up? It all started when she saw that diamond ring on Lana Turner's finger. The diamonds spell out "Dearest," and Buddy Westmore gave it to Lana. But they say Martha had given that ring to Buddy as an engagement present.

Marlene Dietrich is due back in town the first of next month. And here's a tip to the fashionable femmes of the movie colony. Marlene is prepared to give you a big run for your money. She's arriving with eighteen trunks full of Paris clothes and not a pair of trousers in the lot! Most interesting note, however, is that Marlene will be wearing her own eyebrows.

Ralph Bellamy's always been one of the most dependable screen actors, but he's never won star ranking. But in the business field, Bellamy's leading every man in town. You know what a success he's made out of that Palm Springs Racquet Club, which he and Charles Farrell jointly own. And now he finds himself owning major interest in a Louisiana oil gusher. He was approached with an offer to buy in on the proposed oil well while working on "The Awful Truth." In the picture, Ralph plays a millionaire oil operator, so thinking it a good omen, he invested in the stock. When a wire arrived saying the well was actually brought in, he obtained a four-day leave from being a screen oil tycoon and flew to Louisiana to enjoy being a real one.

Meet Zorina, Europe's loveliest ballerina and one of the eyefuls to entrance you in "The Goldwyn Follies." She first won fame as star of the famed Ballet Russe.

Madge Evans is scared stiff of autograph hunters these days. The situation wasn't so bad in Hollywood, but when a girl gets out of town she's in dangerous territory. At a theatre in New York, for instance, enthusiastic fans followed her right into the ladies' room, a situation which proved more than startling to a group of gals engaged in powdering their noses. In Chicago, on her way back to Hollywood, fans chased La Evans onto the wrong train. Fortunately, it wasn't going anywhere, and Madge was able to sneak out another door and catch the Chief before it got away without her.

It looked like Old Home Week on the set of "She's Got That Swing" the other day. Ann Sothern, for instance, was sitting in an old-fashioned rocking chair, knocking off a bit of knitting. We asked her how come, and she told us the rocking chair was her personal property, she uses it on every picture. In fact, she pointed out three more rocking chairs on the set. Seems the rest of the cast liked the idea, so Annie bought up a supply.

When she appeared on the radio recently, Anne Shirley asked for her check during rehearsal instead of waiting to have it mailed to her. Thinking the poor gal was broke, they gave her the check and Anne rushed out between rehearsal and the show and bought her mother a new car.

Have you heard about that movie star who loves to spread on culture at the slightest provocation? Dropping in at the script department the other day to see how things were going on her new picture and give a few helpful suggestions on the writing, she found the scenarist deep in a Roget's Thesaurus. "I don't blame you for reading that on studio time," she gurgled, "a beautifully written book!"

Some of the fans have peculiar ideas on autographs. At a preview the other night, Clark Gable was painstakingly writing his name on a girl's handkerchief, which she was going to embroider. And the nurses at the hospital where Grace Moore recently spent some time, had the star autographing hospital towels for them. Anita Louise got the surprise of her life at the Cocoanut Grove the other night, though, when a gent approached her table and requested her autograph. When she started to sign her name, the guy kissed her on the forehead and rushed away.

More Kiddie Stuff: Don Ameche's four-year-old son, Donnie, doesn't go to the movies very often, but one afternoon recently his nurse took him to see "Fifty Roads To Town," in which papa stars. Everything was lovely until Don came on the screen, at which moment Donnie yelled out: "Daddy, when you coming home?" Junior is being kept home with his toys now.

Alice Faye and Tony Martin had to move out of their new apartment because of the neighbors. It wasn't that the neighbors were noisy, it was because the neighbors complained. They're both working in "Sally, Irene and Mary" and they had to practise their songs at home during the evening. The neighbors decided they'd rather wait and hear them in the picture, which is why Alice and Tony moved.

Janet Gaynor arrived for a rest.

Burgess Meredith is here to work.

MANHATTAN MOVIE-GO-ROUND

By MACK HUGHES

OUT OF the hills of Hollywood come Movieland's glamorous to join in Gotham's big parade of merry-makers. Whether their leave from the cameras is for a week or a month, they invariably travel across the continent for a whirl in Manhattan.

One of the most recent visitors to create a mild furore in New York was Romance Boy No. 2, Tyrone Power—Bob Taylor still, according to fan mail, holding top honors as a feminine pulse-beat-quickener. However, Ty did all right for himself. In fact, so mobbed was he that the poor lad found it necessary to register at one hotel and live at another. Now, you'll admit that's doing a Gum Shoe Pete on the public! Of course, everyone wanted to ask him about Janet Gaynor. That, he certainly must have anticipated, for he had the answers down pat before the questions were even invented.

"I came East to see about my radio program," remarked Mr. P. with a very straight face. "Janet happened to be here. We're just good friends. We've taken walks in Central Park and visited unostentatious places. That's Janet—a simple girl. None of this night life stuff for her. She's too shy to be the center of a mob scene."

A meanie reminded Ty that he had already been on the radio for three weeks and that he had also been snapped dancing with Janet Gaynor at the Hotel Lexington's Hawaiian Room. Didn't that mean romance?

"Ah, can't you skip it?" he laughed. And when Ty Power becomes ingratiating you're apt to grant a request. However, we'd like to venture that the Honolulu dance locale was instigated by the Gaynor, who has a great fondness for that island.

AT THIS point, Alice Faye drew up a chair. "Now don't heckle Ty," said she. "I like him. We both have the same birthday, which makes us twins or pals or something. I had a telegram from Tony this morning. Tony Martin. He's my husband—remember? It said, 'We've been married two months today and to think that some people said it wouldn't last!'

"Gosh, he's good for me. Always in a swell humor and taking things easily, as they should be taken, while I'm tying myself up in knots. I've done nine pictures in a row—too much for anyone—and when I was rehearsing for 'In Old Chicago', I slipped and sprained my back. Was in the hospital three days and the only thing that worried me was that they might give the part to someone else."

Alice poured herself a cup of tea, for we were all Orange Pekoe-ing at the Waldorf Towers, way up on the fifty-eighth floor, far, as the saying goes, above the maddening crowds.

MIDSEASON PICK-ME-UP

BY ANN WILLS

Dorothy chooses a grey cape suit with furred vestee and muff for these brisk winter days. She has a practical tip for you regarding winter suits.

Paris predicts dashes of color on solid backgrounds for early Spring. Dorothy Lamour's dark wool daytime dress, with its loose, wide sleeves, lends itself beautifully to this smart touch.

I'VE BEEN working up to an awful letdown!"—so goes the old song. Is that the way you are feeling, now that the hectic holiday excitement has died away? Is your wardrobe suffering from a terrific hangover as the result of frantic Christmas shopping crowds and too many parties?

Do you feel that you've worn each dress just once too often, and hope you won't have to go anywhere, just so's you don't have to wear one of those tiresome old frocks that have become too, too familiar?

Don't let this mid-season slump get you down, girls! It really doesn't take much to cure those wardrobe blues. A small pick-me-up does the trick every time! One new mid-winter frock, a few new accessories for the old ones, will make you feel like a new woman till it's time to go to town on your Spring outfit. And it won't be long now!

F'rinstance, take a glance at the smart, dark wool daytime frock worn by Dorothy Lamour. It's our guess that anyone seeing Dorothy stroll past in this little number will take more than a casual glance, for when this lovely star appears in public, people don't just say, "Oh, look, there's Dorothy Lamour," and let it go at that. Far from it! "Isn't she stunning!" they gasp, and then they sigh deeply, the men in admiration, the women in envy. For Dorothy's taste in clothes is impeccable. She knows exactly what is becoming to her, what will complement her beauty most perfectly, and she wears it with the assurance of the woman who knows she's well dressed.

Her becoming wool frock proves how smart a simple, straight silhouette with a loose wide sleeve can be this season. The second showings in Paris predicted dashes of color on solid backgrounds for this Spring's fashions. And here's our Dorothy, right up to the

EDDIE KIDS MR. HORTON

BY LINDA STORM

Here's smiling at you, and it's a rare picture that catches Mr. Horton off his guard to this extent. He usually smirks.

Despite the startled expression, Eddie thinks Louise Campbell, with him in "Wild Money," has what it takes.

WHEN I found Edward Everett Horton on the set, an overcoat was draped 'round his shoulders, and he was drinking a cup of hot milk.

"You're not playing a hypochondriac, are you?" I asked him.

"Playing one? I don't have to. I'm a very tragic man," he said, drawing his brows together to stimulate pained earnestness. "I'm always sick or dead or dying or something. Didn't you know? Just dying this time," and he lifted the cup to his lips and eyed me over its rim.

His face wore that faintly harassed expression which is part of his stock in trade. He assumes it off-screen at times for his own purposes, mainly ribbing purposes. His voice with its plaintive overtones goes meandering on, underscoring words in typical Horton fashion, making outrageous statements about himself. You may be taken in for a moment, since the mask is perfect. Then you'll detect the vaguest quiver of an eyelash, or an expression too seraphically bland, or he may pile it on just a shade too thick. At which point you begin really enjoying yourself and him.

He actually had been ill for three days while at work on the picture. He'd been put on a diet and the coat was necessary protection against a draughty set. Which didn't prevent him from poking fun at the one butt of which he never tires. Edward Everett Horton is a never-failing source of humor to himself.

He had just finished rehearsing a scene for "Wild Money" with Louise Campbell, a stage actress who is now making good on the screen. The girl leaves the room and he stands gazing fatuously after her through the plate glass door, droll and pathetic at once.

"Cut!" called the director.

"Just a fool," sighed Horton. "And the funny part of it is that I get the girl in the end. I sometimes wonder why people stand for it, with a face and a baby-blue voice like mine. And such a girl! First crack at the screen, and with all the poise of a hardened trooper. Not hardened, that's not the word I want. Something to do with salt, seasoned, that's it. Though it's not much better. Makes you think of a dish of stew," he grumbled, "while the girl looks like flowers with the dew on them. Dear me, I am waxing poetic."

He was applying make-up, preparatory to a take with Miss Campbell. "I don't know why I do this," he said, busy with brush and powder. "Can't make any possible difference to my face. Kind of like a circus horse, going out to the ring with a rose behind his ear. Knows it won't do him any good, but sticks it in just the same, through force of habit and feels, 'Well, now I'm prepared.'"

HOO-RAYE!

BY ALICE GORDON

Is it true that Martha Raye has gone high-hat? Here's what she says

Martha Raye, minus those facial contortions for which she is famous, can hold her own with the glamor girls.

Martha, being very informal between scenes of "The Big Broadcast of 1938."

MARTHA RAYE has recently become one of the most discussed women in Hollywood. Unknown to movies two years ago, her name is now on the tip of everyone's tongue in Hollywood. She is the center of some of the most unpleasant, the cruelest gossip that has been heard in a long time in Movietown.

They say that Martha Raye's sudden success has been too much for her, that she is stand-offish with reporters, that she has gone on wild spending orgies, and that she isn't saving the smallest portion of the excellent salary she earns.

Well, I met Martha Raye for the first time when she was in New York on a personal appearance tour. The first thing you notice about her is that she is ever so much prettier than she appears in pictures. Yes, her mouth is large, but off the screen her face is not that of a comedienne at all; it has character, and her blue eyes are enormous. She has a svelte figure that would do justice to a glamor girl.

She had just come off the stage. She sprawled on a couch barefoot, while a colored maid massaged her aching feet. She wasn't wearing maribou feathers and beads, as you might expect from some of the stories about her, but a simple blue and white pair of lounging pajamas.

She said to the publicity woman who was in the dressing-room with us, "Did ——— (naming a famous New York columnist who had been panning her) come to the cocktail party? I had to slip out to make my appearance on the stage."

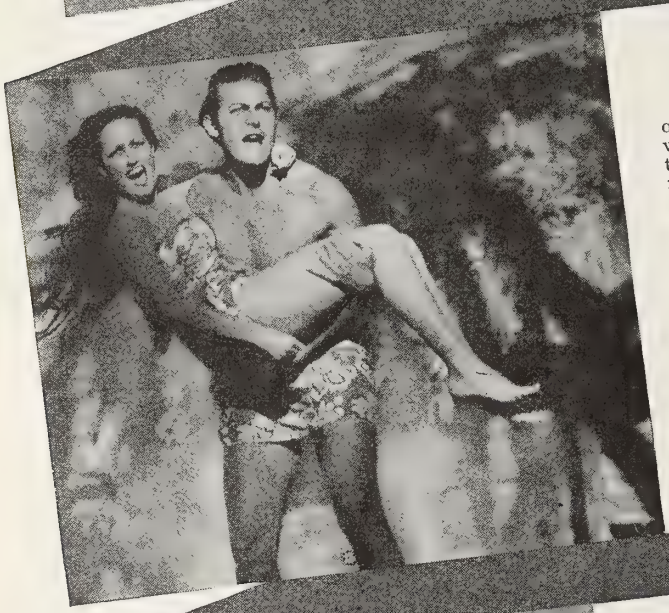
The answer was "No."

"I don't understand it," said Martha Raye. "I've never done anything to offend him. Yet, when I called him up to invite him to the party, he wouldn't even answer the phone. I had to extend the invitation through a servant.

"What hurts is that we knew each other before I went to Hollywood. We appeared together at Loew's State Theatre in New York. I keep trying to think what I could have done to antagonize him, and I can't think of anything.

"Once he was at the Club Casanova in Hollywood when I was doing my act there. I came over to him and (Continued on page 105)

REVIEWS • A TOUR



★★★ Thoroughbreds Don't Cry

Here's a picture you won't want to miss. But a word of warning—it will probably cost you plenty! For this horse-racing story will undoubtedly get you right in mind to tear out to the tracks and bet your all. "Thoroughbreds Don't Cry" can be recommended not only for an excellent story that never lets you down, but for the fine acting of everyone concerned.

Though supposedly Judy Garland's picture, this turns out to be a draw for honors between Mickey Rooney and Ronald Sinclair, M-G-M's newest find. Judy's cute as can be, of course, but Mickey's characterization of a tough jockey and Ronald's handling of the charming English lad's role would be real competition for the most seasoned actor. And there's Sophie Tucker, too, who deserves three cheers herself for coming across with a grand performance.

Though the plot of the story is simple, concerning an Englishman and his grandson, who bring over their horse for the American races and all their subsequent griefs in connection with the venture, the dialogue and situations are all so fast-paced and entertaining that there's never a dull moment. Directed by Alfred E. Green.—M-G-M.

★★★ The Hurricane

Although Jon Hall and Dorothy Lamour are announced as the stars of this picture, it is the elements, supplied by the technical department, which furnish the film's real entertainment. When the wind blows and the hurricane rises to demolish an entire island the film offers twenty minutes of wild and pulse-quickening excitement.

The picture tells the story of an island in the South Seas, and of the tribulations of a native, Terangi (played by Jon Hall). Terangi, imprisoned for striking a white man, tries to escape, and with each attempt his capture brings an added sentence. After eight years he makes his way back to his own island and his wife (Dorothy Lamour), arriving just in time to be on hand for the picture's climax, the hurricane.

Jon Hall is a striking figure in his sarong, and will undoubtedly cause considerable flurry among the ladies. His acting needs much polish, but it is forgotten, as are the performances of the rest of the cast, in the terrific onslaught of the wind and the sea. Dorothy Lamour is also attractive in her flimsy garb, and there are good performances by Thomas Mitchell, C. Aubrey Smith, Raymond Massey, Mary Astor and Jerome Cowan. But the wind and the sea are the stars of the picture — in fact, they're the picture. Directed by John Ford. — Samuel Goldwyn.

★★★ Nothing Sacred

This seems to be Carole Lombard Month in the nation's theatres. And it's an excellent idea, too, for, as in "True Confession," Miss Lombard finds herself in very good company. This time she has Fredric March for romantic interest, a script by Ben Hecht and direction by William Wellman, whose last effort was "A Star Is Born."

"Nothing Sacred" will especially please the more sophisticated audiences, but it has enough rough-and-tumble in it to win favor with those accustomed to more simple screen fare. It is a satire on New York's love of the sensational and the maudlin. In this case a gal, allegedly dying from radium poisoning, is escorted to New York as an exploitation stunt by a Manhattan newspaper, and paraded around the night clubs while New Yorkers publicly weep as the brave little girl enjoys a "final fling." The fact that her radium poisoning is a hoax is known only to the gal and her doctor, but the two of them go through their paces in Manhattan with considerable gusto, until the truth leaks out.

"Nothing Sacred" is smart comedy, played superbly by Miss Lombard and Mr. March with much aid from Charley Winninger, Walter Connolly and a supporting cast headed by Maxie Rosenbloom and Sig Rumann. Photographed in Technicolor, it is also a directorial achievement for William Wellman.—Selznick-International.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★★ True Confession

Adult comedy entertainment of top calibre, "True Confession" is, like "The Awful Truth," a prime example of what happens when a first-rank director, a smart scenarist and a good cast get together. In this case the director and writer are Wesley Ruggles and Claude Binyon, the team largely responsible for the success of "I Met Him In Paris." Headliners in the cast are Carole Lombard, Fred MacMurray, John Barrymore and Una Merkel, and each of them delivers a superb performance.

Story has to do with a well-intentioned wife addicted to lying. Her propensity for fibbing leads her to tell her lawyer husband that she has murdered a man. The little woman believes—and firmly hopes—his defense will free her and win him everlasting fame. The lovely Lombard scores a decided personal hit as the wife, playing her role to the hilt for smart comedy, at which she is tops in Hollywood. Fred MacMurray's lawyer role is the best thing he's had in some time, and he turns in an excellent job.

Una Merkel, as Miss Lombard's girl friend, manages to be attractive and funny at the same time, which is a nice trick if you can do it. And John Barrymore, as a magnificent crackpot who wanders majestically through the whole affair, almost steals the picture. His screen comeback is definitely assured. Of the supporting players, Porter Hall, Lynne Overman and Edgar Kennedy are outstanding.—Directed by Wesley Ruggles.—Paramount.

★★★ A Damsel in Distress

It isn't Fred Astaire's fault that "Damsel in Distress" doesn't quite measure up to his previous films, nor can it be blamed on the absence of Ginger Rogers. The fact is that while Astaire and several other capable performers furnish highlights with their specialty numbers, the proceedings are slightly slowed down by too much story.

Story has to do with an American dancer who falls in love with a daughter of the English nobility. The damsel—in distress—is a virtual prisoner in her family's baronial castle, and the plot concerns itself with our hero's efforts to woo and win her.

Many of the picture's bright moments are supplied by George Burns and Gracie Allen. Most entertaining scene is a dance number performed in a Fun House by Astaire and Burns and Allen. Indeed this alone is worth the price of admission. Finest dance number is a complicated and expert novelty tap number by Fred Astaire, with the aid of a set of tap drums. Astaire himself turns in a first-rate light comedy performance, and there are excellent supporting roles by Reginald Gardiner, Ray Noble, Constance Collier and Montagu Love. Joan Fontaine, in the romantic lead, is too self-conscious to be termed one of the picture's assets. Directed by George Stevens. —RKO-Radio.

★★★ Portia on Trial

Here is a "Madame X" type of tear-jerker played with such restraint and skill by a good cast that it results in fine entertainment which never allows itself to go overboard on the maudlin side. Main credit is due to Frieda Inescort's sincere and expert playing of the woman lawyer, the film's chief character. With a good script to aid them, Miss Inescort and her fellow players manage to keep the picture interesting and compelling throughout.

The picture's theme is mother love, and the plot is built up around the doings of a weakling son of a powerful newspaper publisher. When the young man is about to become a father, the publisher allows him to marry the girl only on condition that she sign immediate annulment papers. The girl (Miss Inescort) signs them. Years later, a famed lawyer, she is called upon to defend in court another victim of circumstances paralleling her own.

In addition to Miss Inescort's intelligent performance, there are fine portrayals by Neil Hamilton, Walter Abel, Clarence Kolb, Heather Angel and Ruth Donnelly. Directed by George Nicholls, Jr. —Republic.

PART OF LILY'S Past

BY VIRGINIA T. LANE

Madame Pons tells on her famous daughter—and she knows

THE WORLD knows her as a voice. A lyrical half-pint, who has made a million dollars with her high C's.

Hollywood knows her as a hard-working young woman, followed around by a retinue of servants, dogs and trunks.

But of the Lily Pons who had the courage to sing to hundreds of suffering men when her own heart was breaking, who risked her life in order to keep her word, they know nothing at all.

The whole story came out quite by accident, and because Lily happened to be an hour late. The secretary who met us at the door offered profuse apologies. They were doing retakes on this new picture, "Hitting A New High," and Miss Pons was detained at the studio. Would we wait and have tea with her family?

"He is a nice boy," Mama Pons has said of Andre Kostelanetz. "I hope he and Lily will soon find time to marry."

Success and happiness have not always been Lily's, though few know of the times she has sung with tears in her heart.

Sunshine flooded the patio. It fell in bright patterns on Madame Pons sitting near the swimming pool, on Nanette, the younger daughter, playing with her five-year-old Viviane. They have never talked for publication before. They were not conscious of doing so now. But one memory crowded another as they began to talk of "Lilee."

SHE WAS the miracle child of Cannes, because she lived, after being the tiniest baby ever born in that city. "But look, Madame," said the nurse excitedly. "She has a caul on her head. She will be famous!"

But the mother was frightened. She was only eighteen. She couldn't lose this first baby. And so began a desperate fight for the child's life. Every day she covered her with the warm, life-giving sands of the beach and as a result she was walking before she was a year old.

Other children came. Christianne, who has auburn hair like her mother, and blonde Nanette, with her flair for dancing and laughter. But Lily, there was no explaining her!

At four, two widely separated but significant events occurred. Lily heard her first opera. And she discovered the cherry confiture.

They hadn't meant to take her to the opera. As they pulled up in front of the opera house however, something wiggled under the auto robe in the back seat and there she was! She still had her play dress on but she'd carefully tied a yellow ribbon around her waist. Mlle. Pons was dressed for her debut. Twenty-one years later, she was to make her real debut at the Metropolitan in the same opera she heard that night, "Lucia di Lammermoor."

The next day she created another stir. But for quite a different reason. Lily found the confiture. It was good French confiture, fermenting in proper fashion on the sideboard when she stuck an exploring finger into it. Such bliss! Without more to-do, Lily took the whole jar and literally went under the table. The dining room table that was covered with a voluminous cloth after the custom of those days. Hours later they found her, sound asleep. She slept for three days.

And that is why Lily Pons, internationally known diva and motion picture star, grows faintly ill at the mention of alcohol today!

She was as unpredictable as April weather. Dolls? Pouf! Let the leetle girls play with them. She had her music and her animals. "Nom de Dieu!" Poppa would say, jumping out of his favorite chair. "What is this?" And it would be Lily's pet ferret that she'd taught to sit (Continued on page 106)

TALKING THINGS OVER

BY ROBERT McILWAINE

Fredric March as the dashing Jean Lafitte in "The Buccaneer," Cecil B. De Mille's latest, and some say greatest, spectacle.

FREDRIC MARCH has a habit of picking picture plums. When a nice fat role comes along, he has a way of reaching for it and firmly placing it in his repertoire of nice fat roles. He isn't avaricious. He isn't even aggressive. He is, to hear him tell it, just plain lucky. However, our guess is that it takes more than mere chance to place a man at the top of his profession and certainly more than good fortune to keep him there.

Before Freddie became a movie star, he played in the theatre. Before he trod the boards he was Howard Chandler Christy's most experienced model. Indeed it was Mr. Christy who was the first to congratulate him on landing his first job in the theatre. It was also Mr. Christy, Mr. March avers, who came to see the play opening night and, because he picked up his handkerchief sometime during the second scene, missed seeing his m.e.m. You see, Fred had a big thinking part in "Deburau" with one line somewhere during the evening to make him feel like an actor. He also served as assistant stage manager, script-holder and in any impromptu capacity which might arise. He was determined, you see, to become an actor.

"If studying and watching everything was going to get me there," said Fred, "I was going to study and watch and nothing else but. I'm not so quick on the uptake when it comes to learning lines," he confessed a bit sheepishly. "I've got to go over and over them. And so, even today, when I run up against some of those directors who like to 'shoot scenes with spontaneity,' I'm thrown for a loss. Some players like it though. Carole Lombard claims she does her best work when she is playing the scene for the first time. Bill Powell never used to like the 'shoot before you learn' method, but even he has come around. That leaves little Freddie holding out for plenty of study and lots of rehearsals."

According to C. B. De Mille, who knows a thing or two about movies, you'll have to admit, Fredric March is one of the best actors it has ever been his privilege to direct. This pair "met up" some years back while making "The Sign of the Cross" and recently during the filming of "The Buccaneer."

IF I SOUND like a circus barker, forgive me," pleaded Mr. March, "when I tell you that this picture is the tops. Remember, I'm not talking about me, I'm telling about it. The color alone is marvelous. It's so subtle. They are certainly getting the process down pat. No more of those vivid prints that get on your nerves. The story matches the print in color, adventure and romance. It's about the swashbuckling pirate, Jean Lafitte, who did his stuff in 1812 and never had a dull moment doing it. Now, I'll step down off the soap box.

"Seriously, I like to work with Mr. De Mille. He does a painstaking job and never calls a thing finished until it actually is. Just having it do, won't do for him. It takes patience to do the things he does, but he has plenty of it and to spare, and if an actor is poor in a (Continued on page 102)

But were they?... It's a girl's own fault when she offends with underarm odor...

Poor Marion—to have overheard such talk! Ann had said: "Heaven knows why Marion thinks she doesn't perspire. Wearing a woolen dress should put anybody wise!" And Jane added, "Mr. Wilson's bound to notice, and he won't stand for underarm odor in any of us girls!"

Poor Marion? Lucky Marion, really. Otherwise she might have gone on for years thinking that a bath alone could keep her safe from odor.

It's no reflection on your bath that underarms need special care. Even when you don't visibly perspire, odor quickly comes. But not if you use Mum. Mum prevents odor before it starts, makes it impossible to offend this way.

MUM LASTS ALL DAY! Winter's hot rooms and warm clothes hold no worries if you always use Mum. A dab in the morning, and you're still fresh at night.

MUM IS SAFE! Even after underarm shaving, Mum actually soothes your skin. Mum does not stop healthful perspiration.

MUM IS QUICK! Just half a minute to use. Mum will not harm fabrics—apply it even after you're dressed. With Mum, you'll never risk your job...never risk offending those you want for friends.

SMART GIRLS NEVER TRUST A BATH TOO LONG

Avoid embarrassment—Thousands of girls use Mum for SANITARY NAPKINS because they know it's SAFE, SURE.

Dog-Gone With the Wind

What with all the hullabaloo over "Gone with the Wind," it seems to me that Hollywood is killing any adaptive charm which it may possess by delaying production until suitable players can be selected. Hollywood has a way of doing that to some of its most promising possibilities.

I am afraid that the forthcoming version of "G. W. T. W." will bear all the earmarks of a dud. Miscasting is probably Cinematown's most grievous error, due perhaps to its insatiable appetite for best-sellers, most of which present themselves to the box-office gentry as "best-smellers." I do not agree with those who contend that there is enough talent available in the film colony to render anything from Moses to Mussolini. I feel certain, however, that a closer scrutiny of the nation's legitimate stage would yield more than an equable return of suitable acting material for stories of such scope.

Unlike most pessimists I am hoping for the best, but Heaven help Hollywood if it finally gives us Robert Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck as Rhett Butler and Scarlett O'Hara. It's an ill wind, etc.—Oscar Shynook, Rochester, N. Y.

$2.00 Prize Letter
Marry Him, Babs!

Yes, yes, go right ahead, Miss Stanwyck, we understand. Yell out your intentions to commit marriage. Yes, you may wear anything. Take fifty mermaids for bridesmaids, the king of kings for best guy, and me for publicity squealer. Of course, not. I don't mind. I'll spread the news from pole to pole, from Jupiter to Mars. But marry him, or kidnap him, if you wish. Do something! Then you can go over to China and show Bobby genuine fireworks or to an island—anywhere—but keep him there! Tell him he's been a bad, bad boy. That big bad wolves bite bad boys like him. Do anything in creation to amuse him. Read Mother Goose, sing him Hawaiian lullabies. Tie the knot hard. And Miss Stanwyck, you'll be doing us mugs, who escort the dames to Taylor shows a great favor.

And, believe you me, this country will register a decrease in heart pressure in Taylor-mesmerized femmes. Yes, Margie will be a nice little girl then. Yes? Good!

Boys, write Miss Stanwyck and tell her that she is sole heir to the Taylor mans. We'll get our gals back—back to normal with heart in place.—S. C. Hernandez, Mesilla Park, N. M.

Re: James Cagney

What I am about to say has been on my mind for two or three years. So here goes.

James Cagney is my subject. I have read in the movie books for ages about the temperament of this star and that, and after all the ballyhooing, I still have the pleasure of gazing on the lovely and handsome countenances of Hepburn, Moore, Lombard, Gable, Rogers, MacDonald, Powell, both of them, Dick and Bill.

Now, if the Big Moguls kowtow to these lovely females and handsome males, why in blazes, didn't they do a little bowing to a fellow like Cagney? Of course, we are glad that Grand National has him under contract, but somehow they don't seem to have the stories or the ability to produce like, say, M-G-M or Paramount. The way I feel now I could go right out to Hollywood and tear the studio up by the roots because I feel they have done him an injustice. I suppose if he were one of those handsome devils who was always kissing his leading lady or loving and leaving his leading lady, they'd have him tied lock, stock and barrel.—Jean Stewart, Chicago, Ill.

To G. A.

I love Gable's way with the feminine gender,
And his he-mannish manner—so strong and yet tender;
And wonderful Tracy, best actor there is,
From humor to pathos is always a whiz!
And I'm really quite fond of the man of the hour,
Talented, handsome, and charming young Power;
And, like so many others, I, too, must agree
That Ameche's as cute as one person can be!
I can even bear Taylor, Nebraska's best crop,
Though he's cold as an iceberg, and his acting's a flop!

But who is your favorite?
You may have every one!
They're all shining stars,
But Gene Autry's the sun!
—Grace Dugan, La Crosse, Wis.

Distressed

In response to Dorothy Reilly's letter in December MODERN SCREEN, which grieved me greatly, I am writing in defense of Errol Flynn's, Clark Gable's and Don Ameche's mustaches, which she so unfeelingly called misplaced eyebrows.

Errol Flynn and Don Ameche are my favorite actors and when they appear in a movie without their mustaches, it greatly decreases their appeal and spoils my expectations of seeing them as I like them. I saw Ameche on "The First Nighter" program a few years ago and think that since he has acquired that certain something on the upper lip, it has made a decided change for the better in him. I never paid much attention to Gable until he grew his "eyebrow" and I am sure that if it were shaved off I and many others would lose interest in him.

Small mustaches, indeed! What do they want, handlebars?—Janice Mae Davis, W. Hartford, Conn.

Plain Talk

Since when has the American public taken to adoring a wooden statue? I'm not speaking of Charlie McCarthy, but of another piece of driftwood called Marlene Dietrich, who has the nerve to call herself an actress.

She is given the best roles to play and yet ruins them all. She should really be cast opposite Ned Sparks, two dead-pans are better than one. It's just plain lack of acting ability, which she tries to cover up by looking ghastly. Also, it's a lot of plain darn laziness. She's too lazy to open her eyes and mouth at the same time. And they call it glamor, and her beautiful!

The only remedy I can suggest for such a pitiful subject is (1) see a good doctor. (2) Hire someone on the set to stick pins in her every two minutes, or oftener and (3) embalm her and put her in a circus sideshow.—Ruth Loury, Portland, Oregon.

A New Partner for Nelson Eddy?

Grace Moore is one of my favorites, but I do wish that she'd have a suitable leading man in her pictures. Not that I have anything against Franchot Tone, Cary Grant or any of the others, but somehow they don't seem to belong there. She should have a screen mate who can sing, and I can think of no one better than Nelson Eddy. Their voices would blend beautifully. (Continued on page 87)

MICHAEL WHALEN (second printing) When Mike Whalen, who was born in Wilkes-Barre, Penn., was thirteen years old, he was well on the way to becoming a concert pianist. At seventeen, he announced this as his ambition and his father, a well-to-do mining contractor, was horrified. It was all very well to play the piano for pleasure, as a pleasant sort of hobby . . . but become a professional? Never! Michael must be a business man. Through family connections, he became associated with the Woolworth stores and fared very well. At one time, he managed three different stores simultaneously and successfully. Then his father died and Michael lost his incentive to continue in business. He turned again to the piano for consolation and began reading the theatrical sections of the newspapers. One day, he took his savings, resigned the managership of his three stores and quietly left for New York. He had suddenly and definitely made up his mind to become an actor. In New York he was given an audition and made such an excellent impression that Eva Le Gallienne gave him his first parts with the Civic Repertory Theatre. After a year in various roles, Michael decided to try the radio, and being the possessor of a good baritone voice, he was kept constantly employed. In 1932 he made his decision to go to Hollywood. Once there, three years of near-starvation followed. He joined the International Players of Vancouver, Canada. Engagements in Shobe and Bell's "Girl Of The Golden West" company and in Los Angeles in "Love And Chiselers," helped keep the cupboard from being too bare. Then, talent scouts from Darryl F. Zanuck's office spotted him when he played in "Kitty Dooley of Times Square." They further observed him when he rehearsed in five Shakespearean plays at the Pasadena Community Playhouse. When he finally got the lead in "Common Flesh," a play produced by James Timony, everything began to break at once. J. J. Shubert bought the play and planned to take Michael to San Francisco and New York under a three-year contract, while Samuel Goldwyn took a silent test of him, right on the heels of the Shubert offer. Michael now found himself in an interesting situation, when Darryl Zanuck sent for him. Three offers to choose from and exactly twenty-seven cents in his pocket! This was due to the fact that the actors in "Common Flesh" received no salaries and Michael had been financing himself. He signed with Zanuck and his first picture was "Professional Soldier." Since then, his picture career has advanced steadily and his fan following has increased. His current picture is "Headline Huntress," with Gloria Stuart. Michael is six feet two, weighs a hundred and seventy pounds and he's a bachelor, girls!

SONJA HENIE (second printing) Blonde Sonja was born on April 8, 1913, in Oslo, Norway. There had already been a son before her, so the advent of a daughter was cause for great rejoicing in the household of the Wilhelm Henies. Her father asked friends what he should call her and an artist acquaintance said, "Call her Sonja, it will sound well to the public." And so, that became her name . . . a name destined to blaze in lights around the world and to find fame at last in Hollywood. Sonja started being Sonja at the tender age of three. She never walked, but danced. She loved to wrap herself in draperies and pretend that she was a dancer. At four, she began to study this art and it was not until she was eight years old that she was ever on ice skates. She learned just as other beginners, with many a hard bump tossed into the bargain, but once she'd found her legs, so to speak, she began to show definite talent for skating. At nine years old she won the junior competition of the Oslo Skating Club. She won it again the following year and at eleven she won the Norwegian championship and went to the Olympic games in Switzerland, just for the experience. She knew, at that time, that she had too much to learn before she really began to skate seriously. She began a gruelling routine of practice, staying on the ice as much as six hours a day and when she was thirteen years old she placed second in the world championship matches in Stockholm. The following year she moved from second place to first. Since then she has been thrice winner of the Olympic figure-skating championship; seven times winner of the European championship and ten times winner of the world's championship. She owns enough silver cups, gold medals, placques, certificates and testimonials to fill a small sized truck. In 1929, she decided to join the ranks of the professionals. Her first professional appearance was in Manhattan's Madison Square Garden and the house was packed to the rafters.

Her beauty and grace won her a contract with Twentieth Century-Fox and "One In A Million" was the result. "Thin Ice" came second and her third and current picture, "Happy Landing" finds her ranking with the top stars of the industry. She's five-feet-two, weighs a hundred and ten pounds, has pale gold hair and deep brown eyes and is one of the most popular belles of Hollywood. (Continued on page 75)

TONY'S wife

She's Alice Faye to you, Mrs. Martin to hubby and tops at her studio

BY MARY PARKES

Tony says, "Alice did all right before I came along, so I'm not going to 'improve' her." A good tip for husbands.

SOMETHING over a year ago, a dark young man stood in an office on the studio lot, staring up at the picture of a fair-haired girl.

"That's Alice Faye, Tony," said the office's occupant. "Do you know her?"

"Just to say hello. But how I wish I knew her well enough to date her."

"Well, you've got a spot in her next picture."

"Yes." He turned and grinned. "I think I'll get me a sandwich sign and parade around the set. 'This is Tony Martin. He thinks Alice Faye is swell'."

Tony managed to convey his admiration by less drastic measures. Alice thought he was fun. Her youth and gaiety responded to his. They were both movie fans. They both liked to go to Ocean City and ride the roller coasters. They both liked to laugh, and the same things made them laugh.

It wasn't long before Tony knew Alice, not merely well enough to date her, but well enough to date nobody else. Of course, speculation grew rife. Here were Alice and Tony going out together week after week, month after month, smiling blandly at questions, keeping their own counsel. Like all young people, they had their tiffs. In spite of tiffs, neither ever sought to punish the other by appearing in public with someone else. When they didn't go out together, they didn't go out. Would they marry? Wouldn't they marry? Were they married? The columns rang the changes on that theme.

Logical or not, the impression you get of your screen favorites is moulded by what they do on the screen. Because you've seen Alice sing and laugh and banter her way through picture after picture, you think of her as a happy-go-lucky youngster, more likely to plunge headlong into marriage than to waste much reflection on what marriage entails. You were never farther from the facts.

"First of all," she says, "I didn't fall in love with a bang. I thought Tony was grand company, and I knew I was having lots of fun with him. But I'm no schoolgirl. You don't marry a man just because he's good company. I knew there'd come times when life wouldn't be a merry-go-round. I knew—" her eyes looked into space, "because I'd been through them. Then, little by little, I began to know him better. I saw how kind, how thoughtful he was—"

She was stricken with the flu and had to spend two weeks in the hospital. The nurse came in the first morning with a box from Tony. It contained a single gardenia, Alice's favorite flower, and folded in tissue paper beside it, a blue hair ribbon, just long enough to go round her yellow head, with a perky bow on top. Next morning the ribbon was rose-colored, next morning orchid. Every morning while she stayed in the hospital, the little offering arrived—a white gardenia and a fresh, satiny ribbon, that was never twice the same color.

"That may seem like a little thing, but to me it was a sign of something not so little. Any man might send a girl flowers. Any man wouldn't realize what a kick she'd get out of a yard of ribbon for her hair. Or if he did, he wouldn't go to the trouble of picking a different color each day. Every morning, before we opened the box, the nurse and I would guess what color the ribbon was going to be. That was the day's chief excitement, and you can't imagine how exciting it was unless you've been in a hospital. Then she'd tie it round my head, and then she'd bring me the mirror. And I'd lie there, feeling as dressy as a queen."

"It's good for my morale," she told Tony when he came to see her.

"You're good for mine." He said it lightly, but he meant it deeply. Almost from the first, Tony had known that he wanted to marry Alice. It was she who felt she must make sure. Little by little (Continued on page 82)

So happy, Alice and Tony Martin have a neat philosophy on how to stay that way.

Alice Faye as Belle in "In Old Chicago" with Don Ameche and Tyrone Power.

MYSTERY WOMAN NO. 1

KATHARINE HEPBURN, American-born, is Hollywood's most baffling enigma. As a riddle, not one foreign exotic can compare with her.

Garbo is a woman of mystery only because she lives a secluded life behind a high wall, because her thoughts are carefully guarded secrets, never told.

Marlene Dietrich has said that she envied Garbo her mystery. The inference was that she wouldn't mind being mysterious herself. And Marlene has amassed a fair reputation for mystification not by shutting herself in an ivory tower, or going into a great silence. Marlene simply does the unconventional, indifferent to any rumors that will attempt to explain why. She is baffling because of her bland aloofness.

But, without trying, Hepburn is mystifying.

Upon her arrival on the cinema scene, Garbo was a normal young Swedish girl whose outstanding trait was self-consciousness. She didn't have much to talk about, but she was eager to be friendly. And Dietrich was an average German woman, so un-exotic that she wore a blue frilly dress and a pink picture hat to her first Press party. She was obviously awed by Hollywood. Garbo and Dietrich, easy to know at first, have changed. Hepburn hasn't. She never was easy to know. And, as she was in the beginning, so she is now—even more so.

As a dual personality, Katharine Hepburn is the all-time champion. Today, you may have one impression of her; tomorrow, a contrary one. She is an amazing collection of contradictions. For every trait that you find in Katie, you will also find its direct opposite. She is both bitter and sweet; courageous, yet craven; short-tempered, yet patient; pennywise, yet generous.

A few months ago, her contract came up for renewal. Her studio wanted to sign her again, and she was willing. But there was one discordant note in all the harmony. They couldn't get together about salary.

The Hays Office bans publication of stars' salaries. There was no need of anyone's knowing what Hepburn received. If she signed for less money than she asked, there was no danger of her losing prestige. But she wanted that increase. And she held out until she got it.

Getting that extra salary mattered to Katharine Hepburn. Not only because it would make her a high-priced star, who wouldn't be given minor pictures, but because it would mean more in the bank.

And most of Katharine's money is in the bank. She isn't a girl who starved once and is saving desperately to avoid ever starving again. She is a girl who has never had to worry about money. Her family has always been well-to-do. Yet she saves more than any other feminine star and has a good business head. She is characteristically frugal.

She lives in an unpretentious rented house. She has a big limousine for her rare evenings out, but, most of the time, she drives the station wagon she has used for years. She is not famous for her off-screen wardrobe. She seldom entertains. She is, according to the well-known Hollywood standards, pennywise. (Continued on page 96)

Unlike Garbo and Dietrich, Katharine Hepburn never was easy to know. Whereas they have changed, Katie is the same now as she was when she first went to Hollywood.

While those predicted fireworks didn't come off when Ginger Rogers and Hepburn got together for "Stage Door," their performances certainly hit a new high.

Katharine Hepburn's so unpredictable that she must, at times, puzzle herself!

COMPLAININ' CARY

claims he'd give up his career in pictures before he'd do without love

STRIDING toward me where I waited on the sidelines of the set, came a negligee, pink as a cloudlet at dawn, delicate as a cobweb, the kind of negligee that calls forth visions of dimples, rosebuds and golden ringlets scented with Chanel No. 5.

From the wide, maribou-trimmed sleeves emerged a pair of muscular arms. Under the swirling skirts two large feet, encased in disreputable slippers, bore their owner onward. From the cloudy fluff at the throat rose the lean head of Cary Grant.

"Go ahead. Laugh. I dare you," he said, flopping into a chair and disposing his skirts so the dust wouldn't catch them.

The negligee is part of a curious wardrobe wished on him by the plot twists of "Bringing Up Baby." Pursued by a dog, a leopard and Katharine Hepburn, he's bereft of his garments and forced to parade in whatever choice bits of apparel the lady doles out to him.

"Item," he said, marking them off on his fingers. "One swallowtail, without tails. Item, one pink hunting coat with Japanese slippers. The first time I go out on the set, they whoop. The tenth time it's funnier than ever. I hope the cash customers' reaction is half as good. In 'The Awful Truth' they rigged me up in a midget's nightshirt that came to here. A bloomin' clothes horse, that's what they're turning me into. What the well dressed loon will wear. How I suffer. Lord, Bergen, how I suffer." He crossed his long legs, drew his chiffon draperies tenderly about them and turned conventional. "Want to hear how I suffer?

"A friend of mine went to Africa. I was worried about him, you know, sometimes the lion sees you first. 'Cary,' he said, 'you face more occupational hazards right here in Hollywood than I'll see in a month of jungles. Think it over, old chap.' I liked the sound of that occupational hazards, made me feel like something. So I thought it over and saw he was right.

"For instance, we work with a leopard in this picture, Miss Hepburn and I. She's the baby we bring up. She's a tame leopard. We take that on faith. Baby won't make any statements. She's a movie star and she doesn't have to. She's got as many spots as a wild leopard, and she's got as many teeth and she's got as many claws. But all right, she's tame. In this country a leopard's innocent till she's proven guilty.

"Still, she's kept in a cage when she isn't working, just in case. When she is, her owner stands by with a whip, just in case. We don't probe any farther than just in case. We don't pry into its implications or take it apart to see what makes it tick. A leopard's entitled to her private life. Katie may say: 'Who's your closest relative, Cary, just in case?' I may reply: 'Strew buttercups o'er me, just in case.' We're merely being whimsical. We're not afraid of the leopard. She's tame. Her keeper said so.

"So here comes a scene with the leopard. She's supposed to have formed a fatal attachment for me. She loves me, in the story. About the time I'm left alone with my feline love, I begin to wonder whether she's read the story.

"We're supposed to be strolling lightly through the woods. I'm strolling lightly all right, on eggshells. The girl friend rumbles. I don't understand leopard double talk. Besides, there's another complication. We've got a second leopard. She's not so tame and she doesn't love me. Suppose I've got the wrong leopard by the tail. I find myself throwing her sickly smiles, the kind you keep for influential producers, 'nice producer, smart producer,' that kind of thing. She rolls her eyes at me. Maybe it's passion and maybe she's hungry. How should I know? All I know is, I've got a new job on my hands, yes-man to a cat.

"Which brings us to dogs." His eyes glinted as he warmed to his theme. "I played with a dog in 'The Awful Truth.' I play with the same dog in this picture. You probably know him. He was Asta in 'The Thin Man.' His real name's Skippy. That's neither here nor there. A dog by any name's the worst occupational hazard an actor can face. Yes, worse than a leopard. After all, what can a leopard do? Take a chunk out of your leg. What's a pound of flesh between friends? You go to the hospital and you're a (Continued on page 84)

It won't be long now! In fact, by the time you read this, blonde and beautiful Phyllis Brooks may be Mrs. Cary Grant, so fold up your sighs and heart throbs, gals.

Here we have Cary in one of those light comedy moments he's rapidly making famous. Katharine Hepburn is in this scene from "Bringing Up Baby."

her COMEDY OF ERRORS

BY KAREN HOLLIS

IF I started out to tell you about the exasperating bore I met last week, he'd turn out to be your brother or your best beau.

"When a delightful man I met in London offered me the use of his Rolls Royce, two of my not-so-respectful fans climbed on the running boards and broke the practically-priceless handles off the doors.

"I always plan more than I can possibly do, and I live in a state of chaos. Our house is a madhouse where the servants fight all the time. Just when everything calms down momentarily and big preparations are under way for a dinner party, my little sister decides to make fudge. And if she wants to make fudge, I maintain that everyone else in the kitchen can just stand aside.

"There is a candid picture of this Loretta Young with no retouching, but there is lots more if you want the morbid details."

LORETTA'S throaty voice starts out all vibrant and musical and then swells up into fireworks of exuberance. You wonder where all the gusto comes from as you look at this exaggeratedly-slim, exquisitely-clad young woman reclining at languorous ease in a big armchair. Questioning her most casually is like gently touching a pearl, only to find that the pearl controls an electric light switch that sets bells to pealing, lights to flashing, and thunder rumbling in the distance.

Looking at her was a pleasure, if somewhat difficult. I had to find an opening where I could peer between the huge vases of flowers that were massed on tables and desk all over the living-room of her suite. From her sleek and shining hair, simply coiffed in page-boy style, to her slippers of leopard skin, she was a picture of unruffled elegance, except for the gamin-like freckles on her nose. She was wearing a house-coat of dark brocade gleaming with bronze figures, that hugged her waist, then billowed out in great swirls of fullness.

How does it feel, you wonder, to have people gaze at you quite awe-struck and write on and on about your beauty?

If there's a nifty to be pulled, lovely Loretta's there to do it

No, not a romance, just Loretta and Ty Power in a scene from their fourth film together, "Second Honeymoon."

"Whatever is written about me today," says Loretta Young, "I hope won't be true by tomorrow."

"Oh, I was terribly touched and grateful the first few times anyone said that I looked beautiful on the screen," Loretta pointed out in a most matter-of-fact way. "Then I got to wondering why I should be taking bows. After all, if I were beautiful, it was no credit to me. It isn't even anything I can control or keep up. I've seen myself in the mirror mornings when I'd frighten you. Anyway, after you have seen your face projected from a few hundred thousand feet of film, it is just a shape, no better, no worse than any circle or triangle or trade-mark.

"I have seen photographs of myself where I really liked the expression, but all the credit for it can be divided among the photographer who caught what may have been just momentary, a scenarist who may have given me an intense emotional background for a role, or some friend whose thoughtfulness and compassion for others touched me deeply. What did I have to do with it but try a little, be receptive?

"Having beauty on the screen doesn't count for much. I've seen women who are actually ugly photograph exquisitely. So if anyone says I'm beautiful, I think now, 'What of it?'

"Speaking of beauty," she resumed, "you should have seen my first test. I was a fright. All bones and angles and clumsiness. I don't know how I ever got into pictures even though they weren't so particular then.

"But the picture I made when I was fourteen, 'Laugh, Clown, Laugh,' that was something wonderful. I had the most divine figure that ever walked in front of a camera, courtesy of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. It was all pads—false hips, false front, false behind." She illustrated eloquently with her hands.

"Don't you roar over old pictures? If I didn't, I'd be miserable. Minnie Loy sent me some the other day that were unbelievable. Sorry I can't show them to you, but I've already sent (Continued on page 77)

George Raft insists that every time he opens his mouth he gets into trouble, which explains why he's shy of reporters.

ON THE SPOT

He's a middleman

By NANETTE KUTNER

WHEN GEORGE Raft speaks of Virginia Pine he calls her "the girl I love." When he mentions that ten-room French Colonial house he is building in Coldwater Canyon, he frankly labels it "a love nest."

Then he hurriedly contradicts himself. He says he shouldn't talk. He says, "No matter what I say it's held against me. I'm the middleman between two women."

And he seems pretty unhappy. According to his own confession, he is not only in a spot, but on the spot. This is how he came to tell me about it. The hour was eleven in the morning, the place, George Raft's apartment on the twenty-fifth floor of a hotel in New York City.

The Killer opened the door. The Killer is Mr. Mack Gray, combination secretary-valet-bodyguard-ambassador-to-the-press-and-pal-extraordinary, who has stuck close to the Raft side since it first embarked upon a public career.

In the living-room, the Killer apologized. "He's in bed. Would you mind seeing him that way? Do you think it's all right?"

When I reassured him, the Killer, ever one for the proprieties and Emily Post, said, "I'll go first." With that he went. Presently, he beckoned.

And sure enough, his head resting on two pillows, his usually sleekly between two women—and tells about it!

combed hair touseled a la Skeezix, his dark face pale, George Raft lay in bed. He looked miserable.

"I'm sick," he announced with a sheepish smile. "I don't know what's the matter. I'm just sick. Tired all the time, ever since we got here from the coast. That was last week. I came East for the ball games. I never went to the finals. I never went any place. I just stayed in bed. I'm going back to California tomorrow."

While Raft spoke, the Killer had pulled out a chair. Then he quietly disappeared.

"Why have you been avoiding interviewers?" I started right in.

He denied the accusation. "I see everybody," he said.

"Oh, no, you don't! You gave me the run-around last winter, and a reporter I know on the coast, and another one here in New York."

HE EXPLAINED last winter. "My mother, God rest her soul, had just passed away. I had to settle her affairs here. I didn't feel like seeing anyone.

"This year, well, to tell the truth, every time I open my mouth I get into trouble." He leaned on one elbow. "I know you writers have to live, but why don't you print my side?" he demanded. "Why aren't you like the sports reporters? They don't beat about the bush. They come right out and ask what they want to know, just as if you would ask me whether my wife will give me a divorce, and am I going to marry Virginia Pine?"

"I'll bite. Are you?"

He ran his hands through that rumpled hair. He smiled again, this time little-boy-like.

"What do you want me to say?" he asked. "Naturally, I'd like to say I'm going to marry the girl I love. I want to, but . . ."

There was a world of unspoken trouble in that but.

"It's been a mess from the beginning," he told me. "I never wanted to keep my marriage a secret. That was the studio's idea. Then, three years ago, after I met Virginia, and my wife started suit, we were on the train from Chicago, and when the reporters asked Virginia whether I was married, she, trying to be loyal to me and my screen contract, said 'No.' In the meanwhile, they had asked me the same question, and I, trying to play fair with Virginia, said 'Yes.' The story came out and the studio gave me Hell.

"From then on, every time I gave an interview, whatever I said was used against me by one or the other, my wife, Virginia, the studio. You don't know, you have no idea, the arguments continue for hours.

"And I'm tired," he said flatly, "tired of fighting. This can't last forever. I wouldn't blame a girl if she did anything she might be sorry for, if she felt what's the use, where am I heading for, what am I getting out of this? As for myself, I can't ruin a girl's life, take the best years," he sighed.

"Virginia's a wonderful girl. She was married to a millionaire's son and wouldn't take money because she didn't believe in it. But everybody's different. You know how it is, some people like spinach."

Then I spoke. "I see by a rival fan magazine that you have deposited one hundred thousand dollars in a bank as a settlement for your wife."

He fairly sprang from the pillows. "That's not true!" he cried. "You mean, she wants one hundred thousand. I haven't got one hundred thousand. How could I have it, with all the time I've been suspended, and the two-hundred-and-fifty-dollar-a-week salary I was paid in my early picture days."

He leaned back again. "I used to fight more than any of them," he admitted. "More than Cagney. But not now. I'm beaten. You can't win against a big company. I was a little boy trying to pit myself against a large corporation. They've licked me. All I ask is an even break—and peace. My next picture is 'Spawn of the North.' I don't even know what part I'm to play. I'll do anything now.

"I liked 'Souls At Sea,'" he added. "At least I wasn't a heel. I went down with the ship. You can't blame me for having put up a fight. I just wouldn't play heels like that part in 'The Story of Temple Drake.' No heel lasts on the screen. The public won't stand for them.

LAST SEASON, Samuel Goldwyn sent for me. He was in bed, like I am now. He said, 'George, I'm a sick man, but this is a swell part for you.' And he offered me a fourteen-week contract to play the heel in 'Dead End.' I turned it down. If they had let him point a moral, if they had let him tell the street boys his life was all wrong, I might have played it, but not the way it was, never! And he offered me top billing!

"Still, no matter what they say about me, the answer is there, the studio keeps on employing me. That fact should speak for itself."

I stared at him. And my mind

George went he-man in a big way for his role in "Souls At Sea." Here he is, protecting Olympe Bradna, who played his trusting gal friend.

When he speaks of Virginia Pine, George calls her "the girl I love." Virginia's posing here with daughter, Joan to whom Raft is simply "Daddy."

Frances Farmer is one star who refused to be glamorous, which decision didn't hurt her a bit for, after a brief career as an ingenue, she was soon in the star class.

NOBODY'S YES-GIRL

BY DORA ALBERT

When Frances Farmer speaks her piece, things begin to happen

The Hollywood men didn't appeal to Frances either. But Leif Erickson fixed that.

"Ebb-Tide," in color, is Miss Farmer's latest, and Ray Milland her leading man.

HOLLYWOOD always tries to fabricate a super-personality for you," Frances Farmer said. "If you're the sweet type, it presents you as being a hundred times sweeter than any human could be. If you're independent and speak your own mind, you're described as a fantastically rebellious person."

We were sitting in her dressing-room at the Belasco Theatre in New York. Just a few moments before, Frances Farmer had seemed glamorous on the stage in "Golden Boy." Now as she stripped off the dress she'd worn on the stage, as she brushed back her shining hair, she seemed to be stripping from herself all the habiliments of glamor and emerging as a human being.

Looking at her, you knew that her features were beautiful; that no miracle of makeup had supplied the glow on her cheek, the strange, almost fascinating directness of her hazel eyes; that no fake glamorizing process had anything to do with the intelligent forehead, the wide, sweet mouth.

Few Hollywood women would have dared to face an interviewer as Frances Farmer was facing me, wearing just scanties; but her figure is lithe and lovely, and she has nothing to fear from the most critical eyes. She stood up for a moment and then began to pull a pair of gray slacks over her legs; she slipped on a beige jacket and a blue neckerchief and slipped her feet into low-heeled tennis shoes.

SHE SAID, "Hollywood makes such a fuss over the things you naturally take as a matter of course. Then, if it runs out of stories, the studio publicists and the writers get busy and invent them. I used to feel chagrined when I read things about myself that were not true, but now I don't mind. I was annoyed, I'll confess, when an interviewer said that I ate raw vegetables exclusively and stood on my head to get thin. Anybody'd be annoyed at a statement like that, I think. It sounds ridiculous.

"In Hollywood, any number of methods of conduct were outlined to me, but the most frequent advice I got—both from people in Hollywood and from people who'd never even seen the town—was to keep up a front. Well, I can't do that. No matter how much advice I got, the only thing I could do was to be myself. I'd feel like an ass trying to be glamorous. I'm not the type."

Suddenly, I remembered why I had come. I had heard so many rumors about Frances Farmer, that she was a poseur, a fake, a rebel; that she had been a thorn in the side to interviewers and a pain in the neck to her own publicity department; that she had put plenty of do-re-mi into "Golden Boy"—just for the privilege of appearing on Broadway. I decided to investigate those rumors.

Frankly, I was prejudiced against Miss Farmer. I thought of the slacks she wore and the faded green car she drove and the fact that she had only one evening gown. All these antics seemed to be part of a carefully calculated pose.

When Frances sprang that old line on me about wanting to be herself, I couldn't resist asking, "Why do you keep on driving around Hollywood in a dinky, second-hand car? Isn't that keeping up a front—in reverse?"

"I was broke when I got to Hollywood, so it was the only kind of car that I could afford," she answered. "Now I wouldn't dream of getting rid of it because it suits my needs; it still runs and it has room enough. When it stops running, I'll get a new one, but not before that. I don't think there's any affectation there. I'd be uncomfortable if I had to sit in a long, shiny car. Besides, I'm trying to save money."

Checking up later, I found that there was a reason for her modest way of living. In spite of the fact that she has played in two of the very biggest (Continued on page 93)

Don't come to Hollywood, warn the Glamor Girls, if you—

WANNA WEDDING RING

THINGS ARE at a low ebb as far as prospective bridegrooms in the Hollywood actor quadrilles are concerned.

Just when we thought things were picking up in the matter of eligibles. Just when we thought that, besides Robert Taylor, Tyrone Power, Clark Gable, the new heart-throb Wayne Morris, the perennial Ronald Colman and the ever-gallant swain, Brian Aherne, there are dozens of good-looking romantics to be had for the taking.

But, it isn't so. Any old meanie with a fact-and-figure mind can show you that, actually, there is a terrible scarcity of matrimonially available and matrimonially intentioned men in Hollywood, today. That even the Glamor Girls have to do a lot of scrambling to get their men.

Let's review the situation, male by male.

In the first place, there's George Brent. We mention him first because, although he is not the most handsome nor the most desirable of the Hollywood assemblage, he is certainly the most outspoken in his attitude toward wedding rings.

Mr. Brent is or was considered thoroughly eligible as a prospective bridegroom. Good-looking, independently wealthy (he is canny about spending money), with an adventurous past and ranking well up among the leading men, he has been the secret heart ambition of any number of girls. Of course, almost everybody knew he was in love with Garbo, but then isn't Garbo the unattainable and wouldn't eventually Mr. Brent's ardor be worn down? Wouldn't he be a good catch when he arrived at that state known as the rebound?

Came some sort of a crucial moment in Mr. Brent's life—we wouldn't know just what happened

Of all the eligible gents in Movietown, there are really only a handful who are matrimonial bait. Michael Whalen is one of them.

Even those movie queens chances of marrying handsome and successful Tyrone Power are pretty slim, they've discovered.

Bob Taylor, the catch of the season, has no time for anyone but Barbara Stanwyck, of course, so we'll just skip lightly past him.

to inspire him to action—but there was a marriage in Mexico with Constance Worth, a pretty lass from Australia who was smitten and swept right off her feet by Brent's charms. Well, you know the rest. We needn't go into details but the recent divorce action would definitely remove him from the eligible category. Wanna wedding ring? Don't look to George Brent.

For Case Number 2, let's take Clark Gable. What, he's in love with Carole Lombard? Huh, mebbe he is—he isn't saying, because he can't. He's still a married man. No divorce has ever been obtained by his wife, Rhea, and what is more, some people say there never will be one, that she will never give him one.

Meanwhile Carole Lombard, one of the wittiest of the glamor girls, is supposedly eating her heart out over him. Carole, you say, could capture the affection of any one of a half dozen men fully as charming and fully as handsome as Clark. Mebbe so, but as is the way with women, she seems to prefer a Gable.

Digressing for a moment from case histories, let's face the fact that because of the scarcity of Hollywood men, the glamor girls themselves don't have the easiest time in the world.

Remember when Joel McCrea, a blond, bronzed youth from Pomona, first flashed upon the Hollywood horizon? Joel was as nice a lad as the girls had seen pop up for quite a while. He was unspoiled, mannerly, fun, handsome and on his way up the ladder. He created a terrific heart flutter in the best circles.

Now that Joel is safely married and completely happy with Frances Dee, the inside story can be told of how two of our leading belles went for him openly. They were Lili Damita and Constance Bennett. They were standing by the swimming pool—somebody's pool in Beverly Hills—parrying conversational thrusts, when Joel, looking like a young Greek god in his bathing trunks, hove into sight and dived into the azure waters. The girls' eyes automatically fastened upon him. Then a discourse, something on this order, ensued:

"H'm, I like that," from one.

"And so do I. I tell you I get heem," from the other.

"Ye-es," with rising inflection, "we'll see about that," from the first.

They settled the argument as to which was to have first crack at Joel by flipping a coin. Miss Bennett won the toss. You may remember that Mr. McCrea did fall for her and was her constant escort for some months.

Lili? Well, I suppose she is enjoying her revenge now. Didn't she spot Errol Flynn long before he became a star of the first magnitude? Didn't she clinch things by an elopement in the time-honored Hollywood wedding conveyance (an airplane) before he flashed on the screen in "Captain Blood" and the other girls realized what sort of a handsome, romantic Irish daredevil had been let loose in their midst?

Getting back to case histories: Robert Taylor. Generally conceded the No. 1 heart-throb of the screen today. He's taken quite a lot of ribbing on the grounds that he is too "beautiful," which doesn't keep him from being a top box-office bet, idol of thousands of fans, and a pretty nice guy in the bargain—level-headed, sweet, gentlemanly, loyal.

However, in considering Bob's eligibility in the terms of being free, you'll have to remember that Barbara Stanwyck has him (Continued on page 95)

Matrimonially speaking, John Howard is okay—young, attractive, ambitious—but, alas, he hardly gives the girls any time.

Ronald Colman? Swell, if anyone can hook him. Outside of those dates with Benita Hume, he seems to prefer his pipe and books.

This blond six-footer, Wayne Morris, could probably marry any girl in Hollywood or out of it, but the Kid is in no hurry.

HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED

BY DOROTHY SPENSLEY

A LONG ISLAND husband may want to embroider his helpmeet with lead because she uses the wrong shade of lipstick, undercooks the filets mignon, winks at a polo player.

In Hollywood, nine times out of ten, the cause is less trivial but more abstract. Invasion of personal privacy is one motive, and a good one, says tall, good-looking Melvyn Douglas, late of Diva Grace Moore's newest opus, "I'll Take Romance."

Hurling invectives at each other in the presence of assembled guests is another reason for using the ax, opines Mr. Douglas, who, incidentally, is very happily married to Miss Helen Gahagan, singer, actress, and all-around grand person. They have been married seven years, come April 5th. "And it looks as though we might stay married," says Douglas, the daring, defying the gods with his voiced prediction.

"We have a community of interests. We are both devoted to music and the theatre. I have a healthy respect for my wife's abilities as an actress and a singer, and she looks with professional pride upon whatever success I make in my career. It isn't just a matter of sitting around Hollywood drawing pay checks, which I am glad enough to receive, but we have the future. When things shape themselves so it is possible, I, for instance, would like to return to Shakespeare, as an experiment," says this ex-interpreter of the Bard, "playing Macbeth to Helen's Lady Macbeth. I've always thought she would be perfect in the role.

"But before we get into this other ticklish subject, let me make myself clear. I don't want to do a Rollo boy around the place and make people think that I know all the answers for happy marriage. I don't. And don't let them think that all these things couldn't happen to me.

"What I know is what I practice, and it has worked in my present marriage. You've got to have mutual interests, love and respect, and you have to remember to think of your wife as an individual, not as a personal possession. She, too, has to remember that you are a living, breathing, independent-thinking mammal, and not her slave. Each party to the contract must allow the other mental, spiritual, but not necessarily physical, freedom. Then marriage begins to amount to something.

"I'm not an authority, like Russell or Ellis, on marriage and the relations between the sexes, but if you really want to know what I think destroys the unity of marriage, it is trying to remodel the other fellow's personality. It's a first-rate reason for divorce, or, if you want to make it stronger, homicide.

"A man usually falls in love with some lopsided characteristic in a woman," continues the tannish-haired Douglas, "and then proceeds to (Continued on page 79)

EMANCIPATING MADGE

Madge Evans is through being pushed around. No more blondined hair, no more gaga roles for her. And she's not going to pose for any more tennis pictures like this one, either. "I've always played a better game before the camera than on the court!" she'll tell you.

Blonde and blah? Not anymore, declares Hollywood's latest rebel—and she means it!

BY MARTHA KERR

MADGE EVANS is going through what she thinks is one of the most interesting periods in her movie life, an era of emancipation. For the first time since she signed on the dotted line at Culver City, headquarters for glamor girls (M-G-M), six years ago, she is being herself.

You have seen Madge on the screen as a demure blonde, the sweet, pleasant heroine of light comedies and of innocuous romantic cinemas.

Only twice have you seen Madge put her teeth into a role and give it what is known as "umph." Once in "Piccadilly Jim," with Robert Montgomery, when she frolicked through a comedy role which was the talk of Hollywood. Again in "David Copperfield," when she played Agnes, the English girl.

The rest of the time she has had blah parts and she has given, if not blah performances, at least nothing to write home to mother about.

Her hair was artificially lightened so that she was just another blonde. Part of the publicity build-up on her was to establish her as the college boys' ideal. She's been talked about and cast in pictures as that sweet, sweet girl, Madge Evans.

Miss E. is all washed up with such nonsense. She's determined to be just herself for a change and see what comes of it.

"I always did play a better game of tennis in front of the camera than in real life," she told me frankly, as we sat and talked about her past and her future over luncheon at her New York hotel. "And it seems to me I look a trifle half-witted when I smile in what is the accepted demure fashion. And, I despise having my hair artificially blondined. It's naturally light brown and that's the way it is going to be from now on."

Now what happened to Madge that she has never really had but two chances at good pictures and then, when she walloped the tar out of them and won ringing praise, never got any others? What's this emancipation all about?

"The studio tried to make me into something I wasn't," she answers. "I don't think that ever works, in life or on the screen. If you're going to be a glamor girl, all right. Emphasize your own real qualities for glamor, but don't let them give you synthetic ones, don't let them give you tennis rackets and smiles and artificiality. And you must be consistent.

"The studio was inconsistent about me. I don't think I was ever given a real thought. For instance, I was called into Irving Thalberg's office one day and told I must cut out that English accent. It sounded affected, Irving told me. 'People don't want to hear English girls on the screen. Be American,' he told me.

"I was a little puzzled, because, of course, I am an American and although I've always tried to speak good English and have good diction, I wasn't conscious of aping British accents.

"When they were casting 'David Copperfield,' they were searching frantically for an (Continued on page 86)

Bette Davis, until fourteen, was a plain, pale-looking kid with not a single distinctive feature. 'Tis personality force which makes Bette the intriguing person she is.

Problems of "In-Betweens"

THOSE in-between years are very trying, when you're out of the little-girl class and not yet to be ranked with the debs. Your figure is straight-up-and-down, with not a curve to grace it; or it's lumpy with what your mother tells you is "just baby fat, dear—it will disappear;" or it's entirely too skinny. You don't quite seem to have grown up to your hands and feet. Your skin is spotty. Or if it isn't, your features are downright plain (you might as well admit it, you think). Your hair is straight as a string and mama won't let you have a permanent. Or if it isn't straight as a string, it looks dumb anyway (thinks you) and not the least bit like Ginger Rogers' or Claudette Colbert's. And—oh, well, what's the use! You might as well resign yourself to a beau-less, beauty-less fate.

Come, come. Cheer up. I have a thing or two to tell you.

First of all, prove to me that you have plenty of courage by taking the following statement without wincing: the in-between years are a period of readjustment, physically and psychologically, and you're not going to be the all-fired wow you'd like to be right off the bat. It's going to take a little time for your figure to iron itself out, for your skin to clear up, for your features to form and mature —in other words, for you to become the attractive person you're going to be. That doesn't mean that you can't do plenty right now to start the good beauty work. The more you do now in the way of eating right and living right and following sensible beauty routines, the better looking you'll be later on. So, let's get busy.

That skin, now. You have just recently begun to notice that you have a skin. A couple of years ago, you were just a kid, and what did you care whether it was clean or dirty, so long as you were having fun? First step in the right direction: make sure it's one hundred per cent clean, not just superficially clean. Please don't gouge at blemishes on your face. Touch each affected spot with alcohol. And then leave them alone.

I grant that a spotty skin makes one very self-conscious. But look here! Don't you know plenty of boys—about the same age as yourself—whose complexions would never win any prizes? Does that keep them from having a good time? Don't they manage to snag a gal to take to the local dances? Aren't they pretty well liked in spite of their temporarily unattractive pelts? It always makes me a little mad that boys can (Continued on page 90) cries for beauty advice from anxious girls in their early teens

At the age of fifteen, Jeanette MacDonald had a pair of legs that were first cousins to pipestems. Jeanie vowed she'd have pretty limbs. An exercise did it.

Deanna Durbin, sky-rocketing on two pictures, may be a misses' size prima donna on the screen, but at home she's still told, come ten p.m., "Time you were in bed."

You didn't know them last year, but today they're the tops!

CREAM OF THE CROP

BY GEORGE BENJAMIN

IT'S AN old movie custom, at the close of each year, to pass around the medals for the best this or that of the past twelve months. Best pictures, best performances, best direction each comes in for its award of merit. Let us, therefore, deviate just a step from the beaten track and nominate the young players who were unknown to movie-goers just a short year back, the successes of 1937, the cream of the cinema crop.

First of all, there is Sonja Henie of the flashing smile and twinkling personality. True, Sonja has cut a big figure eight in the hearts of sports advocates since she was a child. She had a way of winning the Olympics year after year, if you remember. But until the astute Darryl Zanuck saw her as a picture possibility, very few movie fans knew of her special talent.

Sonja headed a troupe of skaters who appeared in an ice carnival on the coast a year ago. Every producer in the business was among those present the night of her debut. When it came to praising her talents, there wasn't a dissenting voice, nor, until Mr. Zanuck appeared on the scene, an offer of a movie contract. To prove that he had great confidence in her, this man put the little Henie into "One in a Million" as the love interest. He could have spotted her in a revue you know, where only her prowess as a skater would have been revealed. The picture hadn't been released a month when the producer knew that he had one of the biggest box office bets in the business. "Thin Ice," which followed, further proved that Sonja Henie was one of the year's biggest successes.

When it comes to taking a short-cut to the top, the youthful Wayne Morris has it over all contenders. Not only did Wayne score in one year, but in one picture. "Kid Galahad" put this youngster on the movie map. His performance in the title role stood out like the proverbial beacon light, despite the fact that he was in such expert professional company as Bette Davis and Eddie Robinson. Yes, Morris may be short on years and experience, but he is decidedly long on ability.

Before the traditional movie scout caught up with him, the lad's only claim to dramatic fame was as a "bit" player in the Pasadena Community Playhouse. He couldn't believe that he was actually wanted for pictures or that he could possibly pass the test. Well, you know the answer, for your

With little experience but plenty of talent, Wayne Morris has clicked.

Sonja Henie can park her skates, for her acting ability has been proven.

Myrna Loy's FAMILY ALBUM

Myrna was five when we took this. Cousin Laura Belle gave her the locket and the bracelet was a present from Dad.

When the family comes to dinner the children have their own table. Myrna's on the right. Below, Laura Belle and Myrna on Grandmother's porch.

At the school picnic. Myrna had on her favorite hair bow and ate too much ice cream that day.

Myrna, with Dad and me at home in Helena. It was Myrna's sixth birthday and she is wearing her first ~~blue~~ lace dress.

Myrna visits Grandfather's farm. She was nine and away from me for the first time.

Myrna's twelve here and stage struck after dancing at the church bazaar.

Myrna and two friends in our backyard. She liked that tree better than the others because it was so easy to climb into.

With Brother David.
Myrna is very much the "big sister" here.

This is the picture Myrna ourselves now.

Myrna is sixteen
here and still so interested in dancing that she has her own school.

I must confess I felt a little shocked when I saw this but Myrna's on the stage, dancing at the Chinese Theatre! I never would have dreamed it.

Rudolph Valentino saw her like this and arranged a screen test. No results yet.

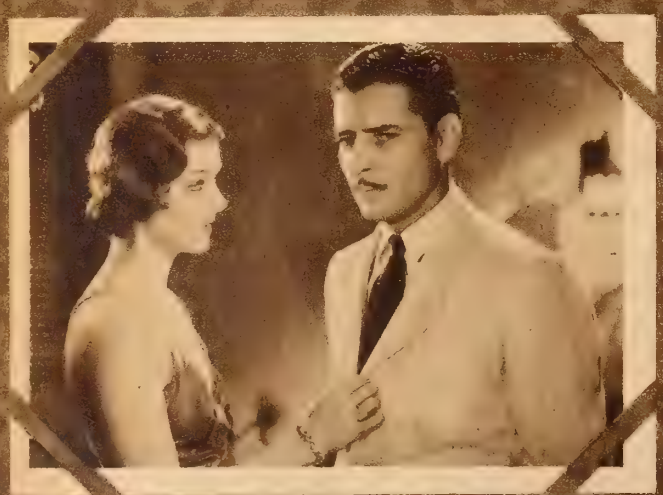
This is one of those silly publicity pictures Myrna tells me every beginner has to pose for. I think she's supposed to be showing off her muscle.

Myrna's big moment. She's all made up here for that screen test.

Now this is how I like to see Myrna, looking herself without all that make-up.

Myrna done in marble. Between shows, Harry F. Winebrenner made this head which I think is a very good likeness.

Myrna's in pictures in "Pay As You Enter." Louise Fazenda and Clyde Cook are with her here.



As State Street Sadie, Myrna is with Conrad Nagel. The other man is Archie Mayo, director.

Myrna was thrilled when she played with Will Rogers in "A Connecticut Yankee."

I'm glad Myrna had a part in "Arrowsmith" with Ronald Colman. She did real well.

The picture people think Myrna makes a wonderful Oriental so she's in "The Mask of Fu Manchu."

Myrna with Ramon Novarro in "The Barbarian." She says he's a very big star.

This looks more like my Myrna in "Topaze" with John Barrymore.

Myrna, with Max Baer and Walter Huston in "The Prizefighter And The Lady."

Myrna's a star herself now and she's making "After The Thin Man" with William Powell.

I am proud of Myrna in "Parnell," she acted her part so well. Clark Gable is with her.

I forgot I had these. Myrna will die laughing when she sees herself in this creation

This was artistic when it was taken but Myrna's so different today.

We all laughed when Myrna brought this one home from the studio. I remember David said he couldn't see her for the hair.

This was a publicity picture, I guess, but Myrna really likes the water.

I'm glad I saved this because the costume is so beautiful and Myrna does look nice in it.

I can hardly believe that this was Myrna's favorite hat when she posed for this picture. It was really the latest thing at the time though.

I must have mislaid this too, so I'll put it here. I'm glad Myrna doesn't wear costumes like ~~kiss~~ this anymore.

Here's another picture I'd forgotten. Barry Norton was Myrna's first beau. He was a nice young man, but she was only in love with love in those days.

Myrna today. I don't blame the fans for being crazy about her.

Myrna and Arthur in their garden. It seems funny to think of her as Mrs. Arthur Hornblow. They are both so happy.

Ginger Rogers is a cinch for a bicycle ride and when Lee Bowman coasted by on a studio messenger's bike, she was right there to beg a spin.

GOOD NEWS

Gaiety, glitter and glamor hold forth in Cinema City as film folk welcome new year

Ginger Rogers is a cinch for a bicycle ride. Between scenes for "Having Wonderful Time" the other day, Ginger was sunning herself in front of the sound stage when Lee Bowman coasted by on a bike belonging to a studio messenger. "Hey!" yelled Ginger. "How about it?" "Okay," said Mr. B., very much okay, since Mr. B. has a romantic interest in Ginger, so the two of them went for a spin around the lot. Stopping long enough, of course, to pose for our cameraman.

That blonde with Doug Fairbanks, Jr., at the premiere of "The Hurricane" turned out to be, of all people, Norma Shearer. Norma doesn't go out much, so catching her at a premiere with a handsome young gent was a double scoop for MODERN SCREEN'S cameraman, who happened to be the only bulb clicker present when the blonde Norma made a late entrance with her escort. Others in her party were Michael Brooke and Doris (Mrs. Mervyn) LeRoy.

In "Romance in the Dark" you'll see Gladys Swarthout getting smacked in the face—and here and there—with a barrage of ripe tomatoes. Paramount's alert publicity boys decided (publicly) that California tomatoes lacked the proper squish, so they wired New Jersey, whose tomatoes are renowned for that quality, and got a shipment airmail from an obliging Jersey Chamber of Commerce. When the zero hour arrived, Miss Swarthout was jittery and insisted that the principal tomato heaver be her husband, Frank Chapman. They shot the scene, Mr. C. scored a direct hit, and Paramount and New Jersey joined hands to rejoice.

That blonde with Doug Fairbanks, Jr. at the premiere of "The Hurricane," is Norma Shearer. Norma doesn't go out much, so catching her like this, below, is a real scoop.

In "Romance in the Dark" you'll see Gladys Swarthout getting smacked in the face with ripe tomatoes. She insisted that Hubby Frank Chapman be chief heaver (top).

Bette Davis slapped herself out of two days' work in "Jezebel," when she bruised her cheek with a hairbrush. It's an old Southern custom, instead of using rouge.

work in "Jezebel." For a scene in the picture, she was required to indulge in an old Southern custom. It seems that the belles of the Nineties, instead of using rouge, brought color to their cheeks by the simple procedure of slapping them with the back of a hair brush. La Davis, never one for half-way measures, slapped herself so hard she bruised her cheek and won herself an involuntary two-day vacation.

Flash! Connie Bennett helps a friend in distress. Kay Stammers, English tennis star (the most beautiful tennis player in the world, to be exact) was scheduled for a screen test for a role in the new Bennett picture, "Merrily We Live." Miss Stammers was frightened at the prospect, so Connie talked her into it, and even worked in the test with her, doing the role Bonita Granville plays in the picture. The test was successful, and the studio offered Miss Stammers a contract. But the English gal was still frightened—of pictures, not of Bennett—

Three's no crowd in this picture. Dorothy Lamour, Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy attend the premiere of "Hurricane" together.

Sonja Henie and Cesar Romero were another gay duo. Doesn't look as though Sonja's worrying over Ty Power much these nights, does it?

Spencer Tracy and Paulette Goddard spent most of the evening in each other's company the night the Racquet Club opened in Palm Springs.

so the deal's off and she's gone back to tennis.

A fellow visitor on the "Robin Hood" set was Wayne Morris, so we asked him the question everybody's asking him these days. "I'm settling down," says young Mr. M. "Eleanor Powell is the only girl I've been out with in two months. And here's a gag for you. You can say it's so serious the studio is planning to star me in a song-and-dance picture."

After finishing her work in "Man-Proof," Rosalind Russell returns to the set for retakes, only at her studio they're called "additional scenes." Miss R. is genuinely popular with the prop men and technicians on the set. She calls them all by their first names, and they love it. A non-prop man on hand to greet her was Jimmy Stewart. She calls him by his first name, and he also loves it. In fact, he and Rosalind are very much interested in each other. Their big romance got under way when they co-starred for four weeks in a radio serial. Name of the dramatization was "First Love," if you want to make anything out of it.

A Hollywood paper recently reported that after taking Sonja Henie to a preview, Cesar Romero sent her home in a taxi and went on by himself to the Trocadero. What happened was this: Sonja, who had an early studio call next morning, suggested Cesar take her home and go on by himself, which he did. Next day at the studio, Cesar complained loudly to his pals about the item, and brought Sonja over to deny it. "I can't," kidded little Miss H. "Because it's true." So now all of Cesar's friends are calling him Romero the Rat.

And here's a diet hint from La Belle Temple. We were with a group lunching with her at the studio commissary recently when one of the women at the table complained that she'd been trying unsuccessfully to put on weight. "You should give up cigarettes," announced Shirley. "Well, that's what the doctor told by brother," she explained.

A NEW KIND OF CREAM is bringing new aid to women's skin!

Women who use it say its regular use is giving a livelier look to skin; that it is making texture seem finer; that it keeps skin wonderfully soft and smooth! . . . And the cream they are talking about is Pond's new Cold Cream with "skin-vitamin."

Essential to skin health

Within recent years, doctors have learned that one of the vitamins has a special relation to skin health. When there is not enough of this "skin-vitamin" in the diet, the skin may suffer, become undernourished, rough, dry, old looking!

Pond's tested this "skin-vitamin" in Pond's Creams for over 3 years. In animal tests, skin became rough, old looking when the diet was lacking in "skin-vitamin." But when Pond's "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream was applied daily, it became smooth, supple again—in 3 weeks! Then women used the new Pond's Cold Cream with "skin-vitamin" in it. In 4 weeks they reported pores looking finer, skin smoother, richer looking.

Same jars, same labels, same price

Now every jar of Pond's Cold Cream you buy contains this new cream with "skin-vitamin" in it. You will find it in the same jars, with the same labels, at the same price. Use it the usual way. In a few weeks, see if there is not a smoother appearing texture, a new brighter look.

Questions without Answers: What singing star, for a time a favorite guest at the home of one of Hollywood's top glamor girls, is no longer asked to drop in? Reason: She wore out her welcome and too much effort making a play for the glamor girl's gentleman friend.

On a set recently we were discussing with a young actress the trials and tribulations of another performer in the same picture. It seems production had been held up considerably by her continual bungling of her lines, and some of her co-workers were complaining. But not our young friend. "I think she's wonderful," the gal said. "Every time she speaks a line we get an extra day's work."

Talked to Carole Lombard on the "Food For Scandal" set the day it went into production. Said Miss L.: "I think I'm still wet from being dunked in Lake Arrowhead for dear old 'True Confession.'" She must have been right, for she spent the next few days at home with a severe cold. Incidentally, Carole and her co-star, Fernand Gravet, are getting along fine. On the set the first day Carole, in a prankish mood, slipped up behind M. Gravet and administered a surprise prod in a most sensitive section of his anatomy. Several days later, Gravet solemnly returned said prod.

Know where Barbara Stanwyck keeps her telephone? Well, she keeps it in her stable. Miss S., out on her new ranch, wanted to go really rural, so she decided a phone in the house was too modern a touch. All of which means that all those transatlantic calls from Bob Taylor, when he was in London, were overheard only by Barbara's horses. Taylor, incidentally, is the only person who has the phone number. When Barbara's studio wants to get in touch with her, they have to do it by wire.

Now that the air is full of movie commentators, listeners are able to get seven or eight distinct and different reports on everything that goes on in Hollywood. The other night, for instance, one gossiper informed her listeners that Jeanette MacDonald attended the opera in a chinchilla wrap. An hour later another news dispenser, who probably couldn't afford chinchilla, told the waiting world that Miss MacDonald was lovely in a silver fox cape. Confidentially, she came as Scarlett O'Hara, wearing an old Southern colonel for a neckpiece, and carrying a bouquet of mint leaves.

There's an old saying that blood is thicker than water, or scotch and soda, or something. However, old sayings sometimes take a beating in Hollywood. For instance: When the Hollywood Hotel program prepared a radio version of "Second Honeymoon," Loretta Young was in New York, so Sister Sally Blane was asked to do the job. Sister Sally jumped at the chance and spent many long hours rehearsing her role. She particularly wanted it to be better than Loretta could have done—for she knew Loretta would be listening.

Maureen O'Sullivan and John Farrow celebrated their first wedding anniversary in London, and Maureen's entire family came over from Ireland to watch her emote with Bob Taylor in "A Yank At Oxford." Well, that's what she said.

LET 'EM EAT CAKE

Fay Wray's favorite dessert is this Derby Sponge Cake, topped with Marshmallow Swirl Frosting.

WHEN COMPANY is expected and you're wondering what to serve them for dessert, well, let 'em eat cake," advises Fay Wray, giving us a modern version of Marie Antoinette's famous speech.

The French Queen made her historic suggestion when told that the poor folk of Paris were rebelling because they had no bread. Fay, on the other hand, does not suggest cake as a bread substitute but simply as the ideal sweet with which to top off any festive meal, be it lunch for the girls, bridge for the club, a social for the church, a dinner for the in-laws or a lavish buffet supper for the crowd.

"Yes, it's a wise hostess who has a first-class repertoire of cakes," Miss Wray assured me. "Out here many famous folk are as proud of some special dish that they serve at parties as they are of the notices they received on their last picture.

One star is famous for his barbecue suppers, a couple of others argue over the respective merits of their Chile Con Carne, each one demanding top billing for his own pet version. Many foreign importations bring their national specialties with them, with which to astound, and frequently delight, the natives. And so it goes, one trying to outshine the other, in a culinary and party sense, through some one or two original dishes not served elsewhere. Or at least, not found in such perfection!

THEN FAY went on to suggest that many a clever hostess in the film capital as elsewhere, makes a bid for party popularity by acquiring a couple of good cake recipes together with two or three frostings, which can add so much both to their appearance and taste. Once you've mastered these directions, advises Fay, don't feel for a minute that you must serve "a new cake" every time you have company. Just trot out the old standby, and if it's as good as it should be, you'll hear only appreciative exclamations from your guests.

Here are a couple of cake recipes for you to experiment with—on the family first, until you have mastered the technique and until you've decided which of the three frostings that I'm giving you goes best with each cake.

The first recipe is for a Sponge Cake. At Fay's suggestion I collected directions for making this from the Brown Derby, where Miss Wray invariably orders it whenever it appears on the menu. It's a good bet for anybody's money, for though the "odds" are a bit high where the eggs are concerned, the omission of butter evens things up considerably.

The second is a layer cake, another favorite of Fay's, who varies the frosting but never the ingredients and the mixing. Let me add a word of caution here. Do follow directions carefully for best results.

You can use any of the three frostings given here. And if you're looking for novelty and don't shy at a little extra work, then fix the cake, as I did when testing it, with the chocolate frosting between the layers and the swirling marshmallow frosting on the top and sides.

DERBY SPONGE CAKE

5 eggs, separated
1 teaspoon grated orange rind
1 cup orange juice
1½ cups sugar
1½ cups sifted flour
½ teaspoon baking powder (scant)
¼ teaspoon salt
¾ teaspoon cream of tartar (scant)

Separate the eggs. Beat yolks with rotary beater until thick. Add orange rind and juice. Beat with rotary beater until thick and foamy. Add sugar gradually, beating well after each addition. Sift flour, measure. Add baking powder and salt and sift twice. Add flour mixture to egg yolk mixture. Blend thoroughly but lightly. Whip egg whites until foamy, add cream of tartar and beat until they will hold up in peaks, stiff but not dry. Combine with egg yolk mixture, folding together gently until thoroughly blended. Turn into ungreased tube pan. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) until done and golden brown (approximately 1 hour). Invert in pan to cool. Remove from pan. Cover with Orange-Coconut Icing.

LAYER CAKE

2 cups sifted cake flour
¼ teaspoon salt
3 teaspoons baking powder
½ cup butter or other shortening
1 cup sugar
2 eggs, beaten
¾ cup milk
1 teaspoon vanilla

Sift flour, measure. Add salt and baking powder and sift together twice. Cream shortening thoroughly. Add sugar gradually, creaming together thoroughly after each addition. Beat eggs, without separating, with rotary beater, until light and spongy. Add eggs to creamed butter mixture and blend thoroughly. Add flour mixture alternately with the milk, in thirds. Blend thoroughly, quickly and lightly. Stir in vanilla or other flavoring. Turn into 2 greased 8-inch layer pans. (Covering the bottom of the pans with waxed paper and greasing again prevents sticking). Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) 30 minutes or until cake shrinks from sides of pan and a cake tester inserted in cake comes out clean. Turn out onto wire cake rack to cool. When cold put together, and cover with Swirl or Chocolate Frosting.

ORANGE-COCONUT ICING

2 tablespoons boiling water
1 tablespoon butter

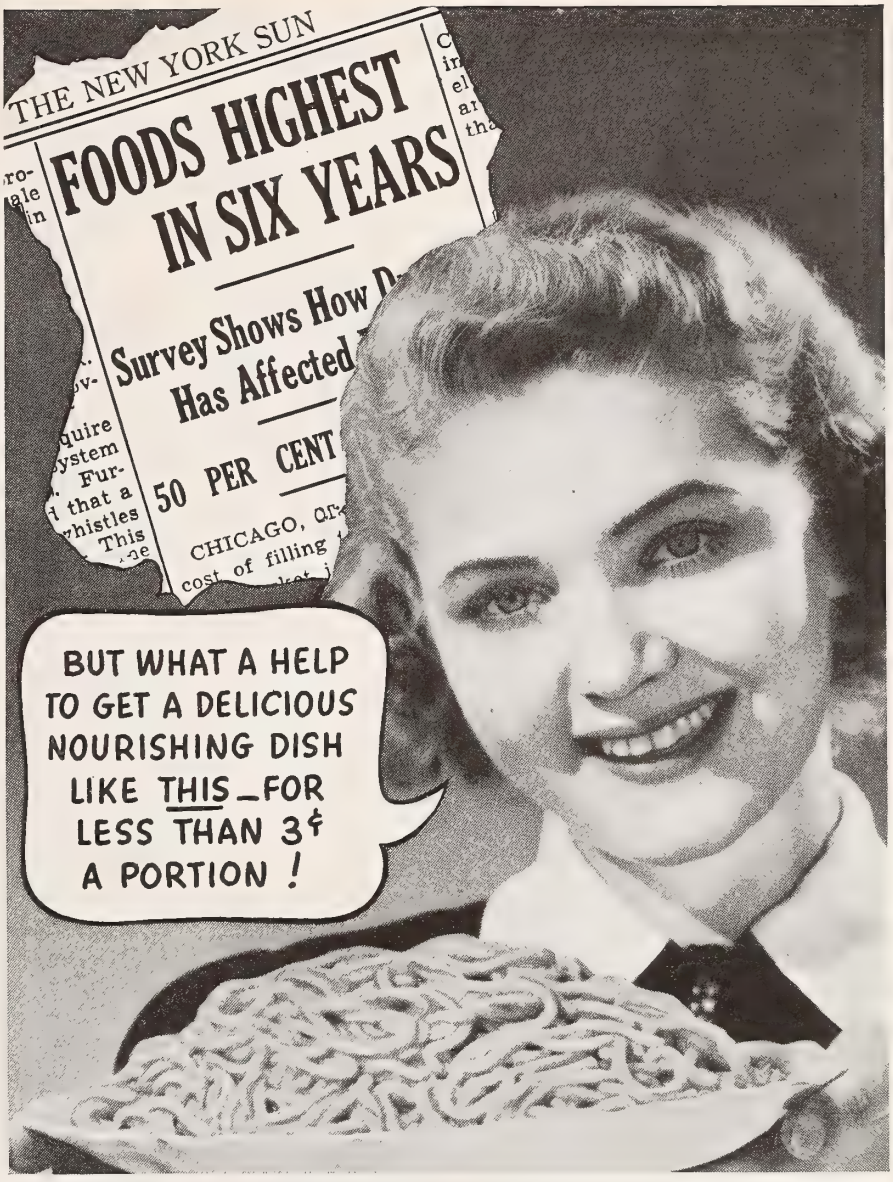
BY MARJORIE DEEN

Fay Wray says a wise hostess has a large repertoire of cakes

2 cups confectioner's sugar
¼ teaspoon orange extract
orange juice, shredded coconut

Melt the butter in the boiling water. Add the confectioner's sugar gradually, beating well. Add orange extract. Add a little orange juice (approximately 2 tablespoons) very gradually, until icing is of right consistency to spread. Cover entire cake, then sprinkle immediately with shredded coconut.

GLISTENING CHOCOLATE FROSTING



1 cup sugar
6 tablespoons flour
4 squares unsweetened chocolate
1½ cups milk
2 tablespoons butter
½ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 teaspoon glycerine

Place the sugar and flour in top part of double boiler. Add chocolate, shaved or cut into small pieces. Add milk slowly. Cook slowly over direct heat, beating constantly with rotary beater until chocolate has melted and mixture is smooth and blended. Place over boiling water and cook for 15 minutes, stirring constantly until thickened and then occasionally. Remove from heat, add butter, salt and vanilla. The addition of the glycerine will give a smoother frosting—one that spreads easily and has an excellent appearance.

MARSHMALLOW SWIRL FROSTING

1 egg white, unbeaten
¾ cup granulated sugar
½ teaspoon baking powder
3 tablespoons cold water
2 teaspoons white corn syrup
¾ teaspoon vanilla
2 tablespoons marshmallow whip

Place unbeaten egg white, sugar, baking powder, water and corn syrup in top part of a double boiler. Mix thoroughly with rotary beater. Place over boiling water and cook for 7 minutes, beating constantly with rotary beater. Remove from heat. Add vanilla. Continue beating. While still warm add marshmallow whip and beat until mixture is thick and holds its shape. Spread evenly between layers and on sides of cake. Spread on top of cake in swirls. This is sufficient for a small 2-layer cake. For 3-layer cake double the recipe.

TEX RITTER (First printing) No drug store cowboy, Tex Ritter. In fact, he was born and reared in Murvaul, Texas. In those days, he was known as Woodward Morris Ritter. It was during his school days that he adopted the nickname Tex, which has stuck to him ever since. During the years when he was acquiring an education he was not the least concerned with acting or singing, except for his own enjoyment. But while attending the University of Texas, from which he was later graduated, he began to sing his cowboy songs in public, making appearances throughout the Southeast and giving lecture-recitals on the Texas Cowboy and his songs. It was while Tex was attending Northwestern University in 1930 that he left to come East and appear in the Theatre Guild's "Green Grow The Lilacs," in which Franchot Tone was also featured. During the run of this production, he also gave similar lectures to the students of the Washington Square Branch of New York University. After the Guild production closed, Ritter appeared in a revival of the old melodrama, "The Roundup," in which he played the role of Sagebrush Charlie and received the best notices of the play. He then appeared in "Mother Lode," a play which ran for two years. But Texas was in his blood and after spending a summer at home, he returned to New York and became a featured star of the annual Rodeo at Madison Square Garden. As a result of his singing with the Rodeo, he entered radio, writing, singing and acting in his own program entitled "The Lone Star Rangers." His radio characterizations brought him to the attention of Edward Finney who signed him for Grand National pictures. He is six feet tall, weighs a hundred and sixty-five pounds, has sandy hair, grey-blue eyes and an ingratiating smile. He isn't married.

Elizabeth Morris, Haversbill, N. H. Gene Autry's latest picture is "Springtime In The Rockies."

Lawrence Carter, Norfolk, Va. Robert Montgomery has two children. His most recent five pictures include: "Trouble For Two," "Piccadilly Jim," "Night Must Fall," "Ever Since Eve," and "Live, Love and Learn," which is his latest release.

Lucille Barbe, Greenville, S. C., Doug Fairbanks, Jr., is very much in Hollywood these days, where he is making "Having Wonderful Time." His latest completed picture is "Prisoner Of Zenda."

Beverly Como, Lake Charles, La. Ask as many questions as you like and we'll do our best to give you the right answers! Kenny Baker was born in Monrovia, California on September 30, 1912. He's six feet tall and weighs 161 pounds. His eyes are blue, he has a nice disposition and no pet aversions. His favorite hobby is woodchopping and his favorite sport golf. He's under contract to Warner Brothers but is now making a picture for RKO-Radio, titled "Radio City Revels." There, now, how's that?

Robert J. Atten, Irvington, N. J. Sorry, but we cannot give you Franklin Pangborn's home address. However, if you will write him in care of RKO-Radio Studios, Hollywood, California, he should answer your letter, particularly if he remembers you as an old friend.

John Basile, Chicago, Ill. "Too Many Parents" was the title of Frances Farmer's first picture. Dorothy Jordan gave up a promising picture career for marriage. She is now Mrs. Merrian C. Cooper.

Louise Redfern, Williamsburg, Penn. Kermit Maynard may be reached in care of Monogram Studios, Hollywood, Calif. He is thirty-five years old.

M. J. Cairns, Naugatuck, Conn. You will find a complete life story on Barbara Stanwyck, answering all your questions,

Men Look First at a Woman's Eyes; Women Notice Masculine Nose

NEW YORK, N.Y.–(U.P.)–When a man looks into a woman's face the first thing he notices are her eyes.

When a woman scans a man's face she pays most attention to his nose. These conclusions were drawn by the beauticians of America after a three-month survey in which 25,000 men and women were asked to explain what interested them most in the facial features of the opposite sex.

Forty-three per cent of the women said they looked first at a man's nose, 19 per cent at the mouth, and the remainder scattered votes for the eyes, hair, ears and appearance of the skin.

Approximately 51 per cent of the men said they looked first at a woman's eyes.

Her Comedy of Errors

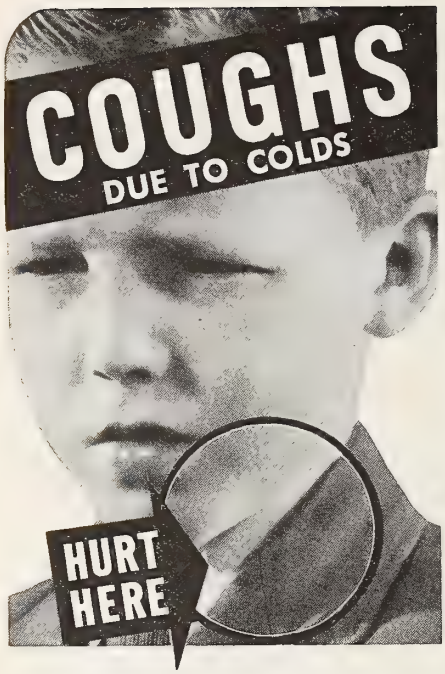
them on to the family. There was Minnie in the picture, Carole Lombard, Claudette Colbert and myself, taken five or six years ago, and we all looked appalling. We had our hair done in dips like scallops around our faces, and we looked too stupid. Minnie—that's Myrna, of course—wrote on it that she guessed that would take me down a peg, as it had her."

I CANNOT imagine her brooding over anything, because she laughs too easily. The sudden crash of anything from a perfume bottle to a budding romance would soon be just an item in her reflections that life is dizzy, unexplainable, swiftly-paced, and just too wonderful if you have friends to bolster up your confidence and can learn to laugh at your mistakes.

The qualities she most admires are revealed when she speaks of people she most admires. The words "gentle" and "sensitive" recur most frequently. Otherwise, she is worldly with a nice, lustrous polish over her private emotions. She seems able to add all the experiences of all the roles she has played to her own in real life. The answer, she finds, is, "Anything can happen, and probably will." She will try to take it in her stride, never let anything catch her off balance.

"Whatever you write about me, today, I hope won't be true by tomorrow," Loretta called back gaily as she rushed into the next room to answer the phone. "I want to be subject to change without notice. I can't stand the thought of getting in a rut, any rut," she continued briskly as she sped back. "For a long time the studio thought of Young whenever a part came up that was pathetic and downtrodden. That was all right for a time. After all, 'Man's Castle,' where I was a waif, is by all odds my favorite picture. I loved every minute of it. I adore Spencer Tracy.

It's not hard to tell that Clark Gable is still Carole Lombard's favorite boy friend! As for wedding bells, Mrs. Gable is supposed to have said Clark can have a divorce any time he wants. Mr. Gable says nothing.



"Lately, I have had a lot of lavishly-dressed parts. 'Second Honeymoon' is a good picture, I think, but I don't want to do another dizzy comedy for a long time. I want to do a heavy costume picture—all big, tragic emotion. The studio officials point out to me that they have been in the business a long time and know better than I do what the public wants, but nevertheless, I want to go dramatic in a big way, and I'll keep harping on it until they let me have my way."

"Don't you ever worry about being typed as a clothes horse?" I asked, in memory of the tears that have been shed in my presence over the mean, old producers who wouldn't let gals wear rags and show their art.

"No," Loretta exclaimed explosively. "I adore clothes and I think people like to see me luxuriously dressed. I've had a string of pictures with lots of costume changes and my only regret is that I made some perfectly awful mistakes in selecting the clothes. In 'Wife, Doctor and Nurse' I thought my hats were grand and the clothes awful. The blame is all mine. I selected those outfits. But a lot of letters have come in from people who were crazy about the clothes I wore, so where am I? No matter how you look at it, I was wrong. Either in choosing those clothes in the first place or in later thinking they were atrocious.

"How could I be expected to guess right all the time? In the past five months in 'Love Is News,' 'Cafe Metropole,' 'Wife, Doctor and Nurse' and 'Second Honey-

Mother! When your child has a cough (due to a cold), remember this: a cough medicine must do its work where the cough is lodged ...right in the throat. Smith Brothers Cough Syrup is a thick, heavy syrup. It clings to the cough zone. There it does three things: (1) soothes, (2) throws a protective film over the irritated area, (3) helps to loosen phlegm. moon,' I've had altogether about eighty outfits that were all supposed to be knockouts. That's more than the best-dressed women in the world expect to find in three seasons. And they do very little else."

"Shopping for my personal wardrobe is a simple routine. I go to the best shops and say, 'Have you anything so extreme, so bizarre that no one else will take it as a gift? I'll probably buy it.' I'm so young and so skinny that extremes seem natural to me. Just wait until I show you what I am going to wear to the Horse Show."

Off she swooped to the next room, returning an instant later with the most spectacular coat you ever saw. A long princess affair of black duvetyn, soft as satin, heavily embroidered just to bolero length in heavy gold and jewel colorings. It looked very Persian, very like something a maharajah's favorite might wear.

"Everyone else seems to be wearing furs," she pointed out shrewdly, "so this should be different. I love furs—particularly monkey fur—but I've been wearing furs so much, I'll enjoy a change. And the monkey fur hat I got to go with a cape I have is so divinely mad, you just wouldn't believe anyone would wear it. That's where Young comes in.

OH, I don't see why you interview me," Loretta wailed in mock despair. "No one could learn anything useful from studying my career. I'm a freak attraction. Got into pictures when I was so young and studios weren't sold on years of training and experience. I've never had a voice or dramatic coach. I'd be afraid of growing stilted and unnatural. The fewer tricks of expression you have, the better I think. I never have to fight for my rights at the studio. If I read a part and don't like it, the directors out at the studio just say, 'All right, Loretta, go ahead and do anything with the part that is simple and natural, just don't ham up the script.'

"Most of my pictures have been mistakes, I think. When I look back at them, I think I never should have made them.

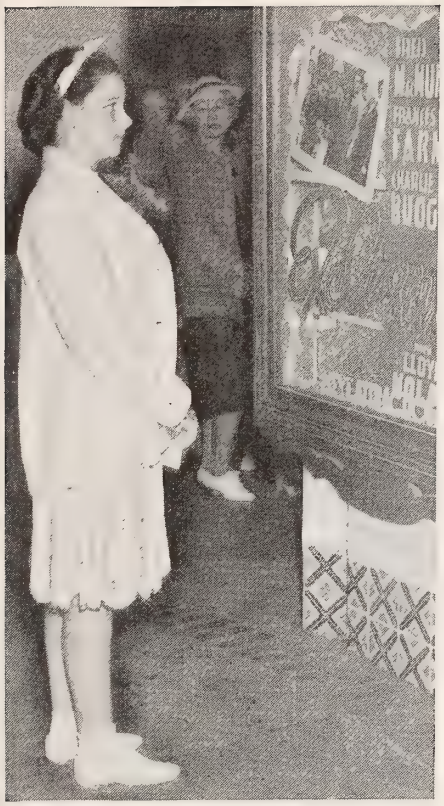
"My only complaint is that people are always harping on my youth. But that's my error. I suddenly realized a while ago that I've let myself be pampered, depended on others, my mother particularly, too much. Until I came East alone this time I had never bought a railroad ticket, or tipped a porter, or attended to any of those little details that children can cope with.

"I can't expect other people to look on me as grown up when I do such awful things. You should have heard me being every inch the gracious hostess, lording it over Minnie Loy and Arthur Hornblow and four others I didn't know nearly so well. I told them my cook didn't mind staying in Thursday night, so wouldn't they dine with me? Then when Thursday came I was simply dead when I left the studio. Went right home to bed and had the second maid bring me supper on a tray. Of course, the cook was out. I'd forgotten to tell her there were guests. I'd forgotten it completely.

"But the guests came, probably just as tired as I was and much more hungry, and there was I as comfortable and relaxed as could be. All I could do was try to laugh it off and phone the Brown Derby to send over spaghetti and things that the guests ate in my room. All very uncomfortable for them.

"Oh, I'm the considerate guest, too. Sometimes I accept an invitation with real enthusiasm and then when the day comes sit around the house completely serene with never a recollection of having made a date.

"Maybe I should have a secretary following me around like a shadow making notes all the time, but I'd feel encumbered. Connie Bennett has someone do that for her and people adore her because she never fails them. It wouldn't be natural to me, as it is to Connie, to carry an entourage with me.



"I have a marvellous secretary, brought her over from England three years ago. When I have her phone someone to make a date, say for one o'clock, she gives the message, then adds, 'But you'd better not expect her before one-thirty or quarter of two.' That's how people protect me from my shortcomings."

Loretta's secretary also keeps her supplied with clippings announcing her engagement to one person or another. She can work up a fine, white-heat fury over that because often she has never even met the man mentioned. But it evaporates in laughter shortly.

"Every once in a while," Loretta assured me, as we prepared to dash in different directions, "I think I'd like to be a part that I'm playing or someone I know who is greatly loved, but if it came to a decision, I'd rather be me."

Between scenes for "The Goldwyn Follies," Andrea Leeds likes to dash around in her speedboat.

Just like you and you, Judy Garland likes to look over the movie bill before she goes inside.

make her over after he marries her. A man falls in love with a woman because she is never on time and this distracting habit, with its implications of helplessness, is what wins her a husband. As soon as they are married, he discovers that he wants an efficient wife who has dinner ready on time, meets him for the theatre at the exact hour, gets his laundry back on the dot. He decides to reform her. He does, but he finds he has lost the traits that he fell in love with, and is married to a stranger The same thing happens to a woman in marriage. She reforms her husband and falls out of love."

Theoretically, he told me, he and his wife don't believe in marriage. Not as an Institution.

THE answer is that the young Douglases weighed their problem well before they decided to wed. Did they want marriage? A lot of parental advice went into the decision. Miss Gahagan comes from a large and solicitous Irish family. Father was an engineer; mother, Lillian Mussen Gahagan, came from a musical family. So, for that matter, did Douglas. His father was Edouard Hesselberg, Russian pianist and teacher. Actor Douglas was christened Melvyn Edouard Hesselberg, but bobbed it to Melvyn Douglas for marquee fitness. He comes by his last name honestly. On his mother's side of the house, the Kentucky Shackelfords were descended from the Scotch Clan Douglas.

As for marriage, Mother Gahagan wasn't so sure about the permanence of her actress daughter's feelings for her new stage leading man in Mr. Belasco's "Tonight or Never." This was in 1930. She knew Helen was Irish and tempestuous. About the young man, she was more sure.

Old home week in England. Bob Taylor, Maureen O'Sullivan and David Niven get together on location for "A Yank at Oxford."

He was thirty-ish, had been married once before, had knocked about in stock and touring Shakespearean companies, was educated in Canada, a year in Germany, and the various American United States. She liked his topaz eyes and the blend of features left him by his Russian-Scotch ancestry. He had a substantial air about him. He knew what he wanted. He wanted Helen.

The Gahagans, romantic and Irish, worked themselves into a fine lather about Helen and Melvyn. "It's a big family, and given to conclaves," says Douglas, remembering. "Half of the relatives were very splendid about it, in the English drawing-room fashion. They declared a heavy romance would be better and if our love survived, then we should marry." It was Mother Gahagan, the reactionary, who turned the tide toward marriage. Well, it was a grand wedding, on Easter Sunday, 1931. Dr. S. Parks Cadman performed the ceremony in Helen's Brooklyn home."

Quite unorthodox in his thoughts, Douglas surprises by being a staunch supporter of old-fashioned conventions. But not for the reasons which the reactionaries might want. He is all applause, for instance, when it comes to formal manners and customs, standardization of the routine things of life. He'd like to see America with an accredited set of manners and modes, as, say, France and Japan have. There would be no bother about a lot of things, like wondering if social custom dictates white tie or black on certain occasions, and whether formal dinner rules couldn't be stretched to include butter and a hunk of bread.

"If we only had a set rule of conventions," says this otherwise unconventional male, "we could devote much more time to the free functioning of our personalities and getting more out of life."

Coming back to the subject of when is a husband justified in batting out the brains of the missus, he says that too many professional marriages hit the reefs when an actress-wife dictates her mate's career policy instead of maintaining a friendly interest on a strictly hands-off basis. The same thing applies to the man of the house if he tries to steer his actress-wife's career.

The Douglases are remarkably civilized in this respect. When Mrs. Douglas had an opportunity to sing at Salzburg in Austria this year, Douglas let her go with regret, of course, because she had already been absent from their Hollywood home for months to appear in a Theatre Guild production in New York. But he accompanied her to Paris (and immediately returned for picture work) without an argument. If she thought her career would gain lustre by a summer in Europe, he'd be the last one to complain. And when a certain Grade A cinema charmer asked him to accompany her to a premiere, in her husband's absence, and Douglas went, Mrs. Douglas understood. It's part of their marital blue print. Besides, Mrs. Douglas actually likes it when her husband admires beauty in concrete or abstract form.

It's probably this tolerance in his wife that makes Douglas set so high a value on personal privacy. It's not the privacy of the bath or the joint use of his pet razor that he thinks of when he speaks of privacy, but a mental and spiritual freedom. Like most humans, he treasures that secret spot in his consciousness to which he and his thoughts can retire. Mrs. Douglas understands that, and demands no explanation.

"What I don't like to hear," says Douglas, reverting to an earlier theme, "is husband and wife insulting each other across a dinner table in the presence of guests, and sometimes hosts. I can't understand it, unless it is that they have grown so bored with themselves that it doesn't make any difference what they say to each other. And they don't care who hears. But why can't they reserve their comments for their home? Why do they have to inflict their boredom on others? They think it's amusing and smart and modern, I suppose, but to me it's bad manners, any way you look at it."

Another reason, and the last, for sharpening the meat cleaver, is when mutual interest dies, thinks Mr. Douglas. He doesn't mean when the joys of the honeymoon wane, but in those later months and years, when double harness trotting becomes a routine. Music and the theatre, as he has said, should keep the Douglases from knowing the dry-rot of mutual disinterest, but if the large winged house, or the new rambling Mexican farm-house they intend to build, becomes too small for them, Douglas can always borrow a boat and spend a few days on the bounding main. And though he and his wife don't think marital vacations are necessary, they do feel there's nothing like a little absence now and then to make the heart grow fonder!

On the Spot

raced back to the two other meetings we had had; the first, five years before, in Chicago, when interviews were new to him and it was difficult for him to talk; the second, about two years later, when news of his marriage plus his wife's threatened suit had crashed the headlines.

His initial screen success had gained such momentum that, due to the pressing crowds of autograph seekers he was literally held prisoner in his dressing-room at the theatre where he was making a personal appearance. Then, too, he had been uneasy with words, uneasy and nervous and strained.

Now all the tension was gone. He spoke well. He has gained poise. He has developed a sense of humor. He laughs at himself. For example:

"When I left on this trip, the studio said, 'Will you do us a favor?' And I answered, 'Well, I won't kill myself!'

"But the favor practically killed me anyway," he said. "It was to make a personal appearance in Boston, two performances. Little did I know what I was in for.

"At Worcester, while I was still in my berth, a group of reporters boarded the train. No one had told me in advance, or I would have been ready. I had to dress hurriedly and see them. This meant skipping breakfast.

"In Boston, instead of two personal appearances, I was obliged to make six, for which work I didn't receive a nickel. Between appearances, I was guest at a luncheon, and as I prefer milk and raisin cake to a lot of fancy food and cocktails, this meant more starvation for me. In the late afternoon I had to do an impromptu fifteen minute radio broadcast. On the way to the station, our police escort bumped into another car, and he is still in the hospital with a fractured skull. In spite of the shock of this accident, we went right on to the broadcast.

"That evening, instead of letting me rest and have dinner, they drove me to the hospital to have my picture taken with the hurt policeman. I thought this was ridiculous. I hate forced publicity. It looks silly. And does no one good. Anyway, I was on the go for nearly twenty hours straight and without food. I've been in bed ever since."

But Raft had been out for awhile the previous day. To a Fifth Avenue toy store to buy a clown suit for Virginia Pine's little daughter. There he was mobbed by the delighted shoppers. We talked about the Pine child.

"I suppose," he said, trying to be fair, "anyone is crazy about a kid he sees all the time, but honestly she has such personality. You never saw anything like it!"

VIRGINIA'S daughter calls him Daddy. She saw "Souls At Sea," and told a friend that she cried and cried because Daddy died. But she added quickly, "It was only make-believe."

And George Raft's friendship with this little girl certainly proves that in spite of his hard-boiled, Broadway night club training, there is a warm sweet side to him, a side that is developing more and more.

Take the house he is building. "I hope they won't fire me before it's paid for," he said with a wink. "It's a love nest. I wanted to give it to my mother, but the very day the builders started, she died."

There was a frantic signaling from the doorway. And an abrupt, "Excuse me." The Killer was once more in our midst.

"You gotta get up," he said. "You got an appointment."

So I said goodby. And I wished him luck. "Maybe things will smooth themselves out. You deserve a break."

"I hope so," he groaned. "This trip was certainly a flop." And suddenly remembering the Yankees' sweeping baseball victory, "You see, besides everything else, I bet on the Giants!"

Can Rosemary Lane be poking fun at Dick Powell? It's an off-stage moment on the "Hollywood Hotel" set.

FOUR years ago, doctors learned that a certain vitamin applied direct to the skin healed the skin quicker in burns and wounds.

Then Pond's started research on what this vitamin would do for skin when put in Pond's Creams. Today—you have its benefits for your skin—in Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Vanishing Cream. Now this famous cream does more than smooth for powder and soften overnight. Its use now nourishes the skin. Women who use it say it makes their skin look clearer; pores seem finer.

ALICE FAYE PUTS PLENTY OF "UMPH" INTO HER RENDI-

"Who Killed Maggie?" Alice Faye takes the stand!

"Sure, I'll speak the truth and nothing but."

she did. Little by little, her dependence on him grew until one day it was borne in on her that, with Tony away, she felt lost. It came as a kind of original discovery.

"I guess that's how you ought to feel about your husband," she told her astonished self, and for the first time entertained the notion that this friendship might end in wedlock.

They were invited to spend a week-end at the beach home of a friend. That night they walked along the shore in the moonlight, and Alice said "Yes."

Then the exultant Tony refused to be put off.

"We ought to wait till I finish the picture," said Alice.

"You don't even start till next week. Then there'll be another and another and another—let's do it now."

"Mother's in New York. We ought to wait till she gets back."

"She won't mind if you're happy. I'll make you happy, Alice."

There was something in the way he said it, that made further resistance unthinkable.

Back in town, Alice phoned East to her mother.

"Are you positive and sure?" Mrs. Faye asked her.

"I'm positive and sure."

"Then go ahead—and bless you both."

They boarded the plane for Yuma, landing under a sun that blazed as the sun can blaze in Arizona. Alice was frankly indignant. "I wanted to look so nice at my wedding," she wailed, "and I'm all withered."

As for Tony, he was probably unaware of heat, clothes or the ground under his feet. Standing before the judge, his legs shook like a couple of saplings in a gale. "Repeat this after me," said the judge. And Tony, in a daze, repeated it after him and forgot to stop.

"In the name of the state of Arizona—" intoned the judge.

"In the name of the state of Arizona," said Tony obediently, blind to the judge's violently negating head.

"I now pronounce you man and wife—"

"I now pronounce you—" Then Tony recovered a measure of consciousness, and slipped the ring on Alice's finger.

"I don't feel married," she laughed a little shakily, engulfed in her husband's arms. "It went so fast—"

They had only time for breakfast before catching the plane back to Los Angeles. On Monday, Alice was to start work in "You're a Sweetheart." They took an apartment. With no time for domestic duties, Alice gratefully left the menage in charge of Tony's Filipino boy, and reported to the studio. Tony wasn't working at the moment, so a normal day ran something like this.

The bride would leave the house at 6:30. Tony would generally drive out to the studio to lunch with her. Sometimes he'd spend an hour or two on the set. Sometimes he'd watch for a moment, call, "So long, honey," and disappear. With movies, a radio program and recordings on their minds, they were both under something of a strain. Alike in intensity, drive and absorption in work, Tony's sixth sense would tell him when his presence would help and when it would distract Alice. Sometimes, after she'd done a particularly difficult scene, he'd drop down on the arm of a chair without saying a word; or let fall a casual, "We'll go out to the beach tonight and just sit." She'd go into her next scene, refreshed by the prospect of a restful evening ahead.

Always he'd call for her at night and drive her home. "Would the Mrs. like to dine out?" he might inquire.

"No, if the Mr. doesn't mind."

This method of referring to themselves they've taken over, with secret delight, from the household staff. To their Filipino and to Alice's maid they became the Mr. and Mrs. by common consent on their wedding day.

"The Mrs. likes your cooking," they overheard the maid say.

"I am glad," the Filipino replied. "If I please the Mrs., the Mr. will also be pleased."

"That's us," whispered Tony in high glee.

With no honeymoon and little leisure, they haven't had much chance for that adjustment to marriage which the books tell us is so necessary. They have instead, a sober awareness of the problems of marriage, rare in two so young.

"I married Tony," says Alice, "because I liked the way he was. I suppose I can go so far as to say the same for him. We share enough interests to give us plenty to talk about. If he likes some things I don't, and the other way round—well married or not, we're still two separate people."

So when Tony goes off on Sunday morn-

TION OF "WHO KILLED MAGGIE?" BIG PRODUCTION NUMBER IN "YOU'RE A SWEETHEART"

"I was home with Ma that night, so there!"

"I'll have you know I'm an honest working girl!"

"So now you know as much as I do about it."

ing to play golf—a game Alice has no interest in—she settles contentedly down to being a golf widow while he's away. "After all, I spent Sunday mornings without Tony for a good many years. Why should I let him give up something he enjoys just to hold my hand? That's kid stuff. And it sounds as if I were handing myself an orchid I don't even rate." A gleam of laughter flitted across her face. "Because I don't miss him. I sleep till he gets back."

And if Tony views with alarm his wife's habit of going breakfastless to work, he doesn't nag her about it. "Sure I think she ought to eat more. But I figure it this way. She did pretty well for herself before I came along. Why should I barge in with improvements? My ambition's to be a husband, without being a pest."

They made one other agreement—never to read the gossip columns.

As Alice describes it: "Suppose I'm working, and Tony's off for the day. Suppose I have lunch with someone in the commissary. I might not even think to tell him about it, any more than I'd think to tell him I had my nails done. One's just as much a matter of routine as the other. Then suppose it appeared in the paper. Tony might get sore—not at me, but whoever put it in. So we just don't read the columns."

If this sounds far-fetched, consider an experience Alice had when she visited New York after her marriage. A reporter approached her in the lobby of the hotel, his face drawn in sympathetic lines. "Too bad about you kids," he sighed. "Too bad it couldn't have lasted longer."

"What couldn't last?" cried Alice.

"Oh, come now. I know you're here for a divorce."

She gasped, opened her mouth, then closed it tight and turned away. "Two months," she commented drily, "and they're after us already. If I'd denied it, he'd have printed the denial. This way at least, there was nothing to print."

Neither she nor Tony is making any large statements. They refuse to be photographed in ecstatic attitudes, they refuse to burble, "This is for life, this marriage."

"Too many people have said that and then gone on the rocks. We're not asking or making promises. We're not singing, 'Will you love me in December as you do in May?' We love each other now. If we make a go of it now, December will take care of itself. We're trying, and that's the best we can do."

From the look of things, Cary Grant's lighting up for a session.

Now that he's all set, anything can happen, and probably will.

Complainin' Cary

hero. But a dog can cock his head and make a sap out of you.

A dog sticks out his paw or waggles an ear, and he brings down the house. A man sticks out his paw and who the deuce cares? He waggles an ear, and they tell him, don't be silly. Silly, my foot. When a man waggles an ear, he's really accomplished something. It's unfair discrimination against the two-legged. By the time you're through, that dog's given you an inferiority complex and a split personality and a couple of hydrophobias.

"And that's not all he does. He's one of these blinking reformers. He's not satisfied to let you be yourself. He wants you to be Bill Powell. All right, if you don't believe me, ask Leo McCarey. Ask Irene Dunne. Ask Skippy.

"We had to do a close-up together in 'The Awful Truth.' An emotional close-up, looking into each other's eyes. Well, that pooch wouldn't look me in the eye. We coaxed him, we reasoned with him, we fed him peanuts. He kept staring straight at my upper lip. This went on for days. Finally, you know how it is, you start getting self-conscious. I'm not one to go round bragging about my upper lip, but it's no worse than others I've met. I certainly didn't see why the dog should get personal about it.

"One day McCarey claps his hand to his brow and yells: 'I've got it. He's lonesome for Bill Powell's moustache.'

" 'Maybe I could borrow it,' I said.

" 'No, Bill's in Europe. Looks like you'll have to grow your own, Cary.'

" 'That's easy,' I said, 'compared with what you'll have to do. Just shoot the whole picture over.'

"So they go into a huddle with the dog, tell him I'm really Bill Powell with the moustache shaved off. He doesn't believe it. Finally McCarey whispers something in his ear. That does the trick. He bounds over, looks me in the eye and they shoot the close-up.

"McCarey wouldn't give the secret away. But one day when Skippy was off-guard, I asked him suddenly: 'What did McCarey say?'

" 'Harry Cohn,' says Skippy." (Harry Cohn, be it mentioned, is the boss of Columbia, at whose nod mountains tremble.)

"That covers the wild-life hazard. I haven't had time to classify the others yet. So with your permission, I'll lump them under miscellaneous.

"I was never seasick till they rocked a boat under me on dry land in 'Sylvia Scarlett.' They had to make sure it was realistic enough. That's where the ocean scores. She doesn't have to worry about the box office take.

"I never fainted till a fellow breathed garlic into my face in 'When You're in Love.' Realism again, plus the director's idea of a sweet little rib. Or maybe he thought I hadn't temperament enough to pretend I smelled garlic. My head reeled, but the boy stood on the burning deck through the reek of fumes. In other words, I fainted standing up. Try that on your bazooka some time.

"I never had rigor mortis till I went into 'Topper.' I don't know how they worked that disappearing act. All I know is that Connie Bennett and I had to stand like a couple of flagpoles in the wind for twenty minutes at a time while something happened. If we breathed, they had to do whatever it was they were doing all over again. So we didn't breathe. When it was over, they cut us down and carted us off in barrows to be thawed out.

"There's also the danger of being identified with a part you play and can't live up to. Pick me a choicer occupational hazard than that one. Some day when I can afford it, I'm going to hire a writer to supply me with off-screen dialogue. You go into a picture that crackles with brilliant lines. Then you go to a party. 'Oh, there's that clever Cary Grant. He pulled off some of the cutest cracks in his last picture.' So they stand around and wait for you to crack cute. You yell, 'Author, author,' but he's at some other party. You pull your own cracks or you don't pull any. Either way you lose.

"Of course, you can argue that my being an actor doesn't make me any dumber than I'd otherwise be. But if I were the milkman, the contrast wouldn't be so marked. As long as I outsmarted the cows, they'd think I was terrific.

"And that brings us to the final danger." His lashes lifted, and a curiously level glance shot from his bright brown eyes. "The danger of getting your values wrong."

BY THIS time you're geared to a mood where you're likely to look behind his soberest statement for its comic intent. I was startled to find that there wasn't any.

I was in for a second shock. "I'd give this all up for peace of mind," he was saying. "Money's important to peace of mind,

Whatever goes on, Cary isn't just sure whether he likes it or not.

But it's all right now and Mr. Grant can let go and smile.

I grant you. A moderate amount. More than that doesn't matter. What do you do with it? Buy a bigger car. But that doesn't steady the ground under your feet.

"Doubt away," he said. "Sure, I'd rather have both. But if I had to choose between all this on the one hand, and on the other, a home and children and someone to love and love me, I'd choose the home, et cetera, without thinking twice. There is no choice. One way your life's full, the other way it's empty."

"Do you plan to do something about it?"

His face turned dreamy. "That's another weakness actors suffer from. They talk too much."

The girl he refuses to talk about is Phyllis Brooks. You saw her in "You Can't Have Everything," "In Old Chicago" features her still more prominently, for her studio is grooming her for stardom.

She's the first girl whom Cary has been seeing steadily since his marriage to Virginia Cherrill went on the rocks. It's no secret to his friends that the failure of that marriage hit him hard. Being a normal young man, however, with no tendency toward anchoretism, he began going out presently with this girl and that. The point is, it was always this girl and that.

It was never the one girl, that is, not until, fresh from her New York triumph in "Stage Door," Phyllis Brooks came to Hollywood. She has been described as a blonde with a brunette personality. Fair-haired and blue-eyed, her face is demure in repose. But in smile or speech, a vein of quick humor lights it up so vividly as to give it an almost gamin quality, all the more piquaint by contrast.

For six months now, she and Cary have been inseparable. Neither dates anyone else, "They never seem to run out of fun," one of their friends commented. "They start laughing the minute they get together, and they never stop."

MARRIAGE, they decline to discuss, at any rate, where the press can overhear them. Otherwise, they're frank in their preference for each other. They hold hands at previews. They sat in the gallery to see "Dangerously Yours," in which Phyllis appears. The second feature happened to be "Topper."

"Let's stay," Phyllis begged.

"But you've only seen it three times," protested Cary.

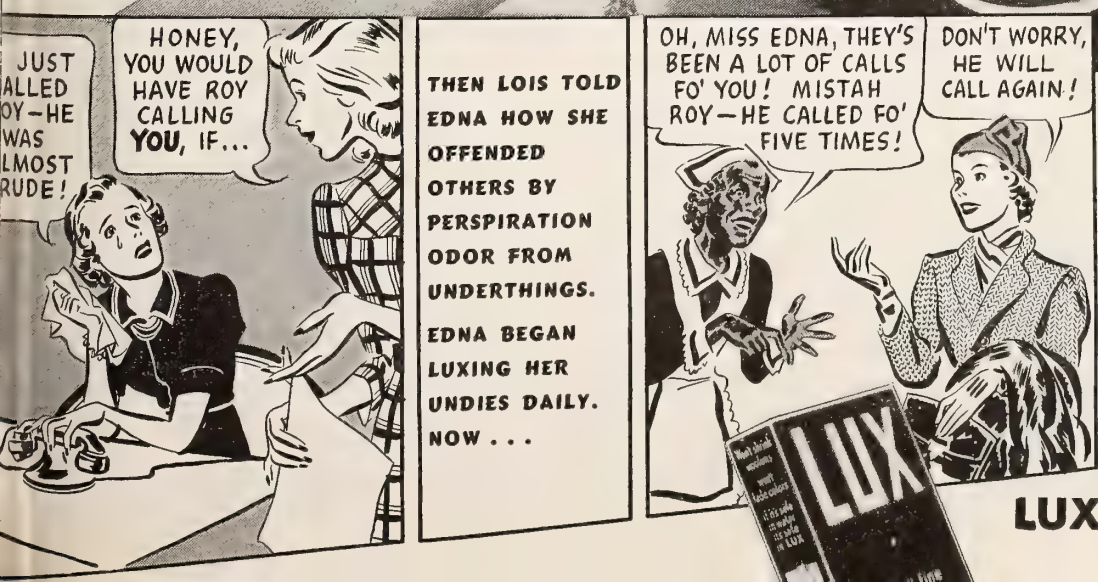
"I don't care," said Phyllis. "I love to watch you disappear."

After her last birthday, two new rings, a diamond and a ruby, graced her hand.

"Did Cary give you the diamond?" some enterprising soul asked her.

"The diamond's from my mother," she smiled, with the faintest possible emphasis on diamond. Whom the ruby was from remained undivulged.

But there's no guessing about her new vanity case with its ruby clasp and its inscription engraved in the donor's own handwriting: "To Phyllis from Cary."



Not long ago, a radio gossiper announced that they would be married within two weeks. Asked to verify or deny the statement, they replied: "Mmmph!" Interpret it as you like.

The gossiper was wrong. Two weeks and more have passed, and they're not married. But they're still inseparable. Maybe they haven't made up their own minds. Maybe they're just not ready to tell.

Faced with a pointblank question, Cary flashed his faunlike grin, "Guess," he said, "that's your occupational hazard."

NO MAN or woman wants to have a finger poked at them or receive sympathy because of an unhealthy skin appearance.

Some skin troubles are tough to correct, but we do know this—skin tissues like the body itself must be fed from within.

To make the food we eat available for strength and energy, there must be an abundance of red-blood-cells.

Worry, overwork, undue strain, unbalanced diet, a cold, perhaps, as well as other causes, "burn-up" your red-blood-cells faster than the body renews.

S.S.S. Tonic builds these precious red cells. It is a simple, internal remedy, tested for generations and also proven by scientific research.

Emancipating Madge

English girl to play the role of Agnes. When I asked for a chance, they laughed and told me to remember I was the college girl sweetheart, the typical American girl.

I USED to sit in my dressing-room on the lot and hear them testing girls. Girl after girl. Practically everybody in Hollywood and many from elsewhere. Finally I went to David Selznick and said, 'Please, won't you just give me a test? Everybody else has had one. Just a test, at least.' Well, he did and I got the role, but I never could have, if I hadn't practically begged for it.

"I got the role, but do you think that changed my luck with picture assignments and I was given a chance to do anything else out of the ordinary? Others on the lot were given chances at strong roles, but not I!

"I loved doing 'Piccadilly Jim' and the reactions were good, but that, too, seemed to have no bearing on my future.

"So, a month ago, when I was called in and told I was to do a musical at Republic on loan, I rebelled. It was just another blah role and I'd had all I wanted. I bought up my contract and by so doing bought my freedom.

"What the future will bring, I don't know, but I am having a marvelous time being myself for a change. I'd like to do a play on the New York stage, if I could find one, because, of course, it was from the stage I went to M-G-M and I love the theatre."

From the publicity copy which has been released about Madge, you probably remember her best as a child star in films and as the little girl who posed for those well known soap advertisements when just two years old.

She actually was a child star and her first full length film was "Sudden Riches" directed by Emil Chautard, with Robert Warwick as the star. She also played kiddie parts with such favorites as Alice Brady, Ethel Clayton, Montagu Love and Holbrook Blinn. All these pictures were done in the East at Fort Lee, New Jersey. She continued these child parts for seven years, studying with private tutors between engagements. At thirteen she was John Barrymore's leading lady in "Peter Ibbetson" and then when fourteen, she played opposite Richard Barthelmess in "Classmates."

Then came the stage, one of the happier periods of her professional life. She did stock in the East and in the West. She remembers coping with unexpected sound effects in the form of fruit trains rumbling by the little summer playhouse at Milford, New York. Says she:

"During the harvest season, you'd get as many as half a dozen trains in an evening. The playhouse was near the railroad track and when a freight rumbled by, you couldn't hear a word from the stage. So we adopted the simple expedient of quickly flashing out the lights, leaving the house in darkness until the last fruit car pulled around the bend. I remember one night we had a dreadful time staging a shooting scene in 'The Bad Man.' Just as the leading man would pull his gun and get ready to shoot up the place, here would come a train, and out would go the lights."

She looks back with fond recollection on eighteen weeks spent at the famous Ellitch Gardens, in Colorado, where so many fine actors and actresses had their start and where it is still considered an honor to get an engagement.

She was on Broadway in such plays as "Conquering Male," "Dread," "Our Betters," "The Marquis" and George Kelley's "Phillip Goes Forth," which was the play that attracted the attention of M-G-M.

What manner of gal is this new emancipated Madge Evans, who at this writing hasn't yet a job?

Meet Madge as I did, in such a setting as a fashionable Manhattan hotel, frequented by the loveliest and best dressed women of New York, and you are struck instantly by her beauty.

SHE has a lovely, finely chiseled face, clear blue eyes, a sensitive mouth. She talks quietly but she neither minces words nor does she go overly-dramatic. She gives you a feeling of confidence in herself and her ability. As a matter of fact, Madge Evans is a whale of a good actress, is recognized as one.

Says Una Merkel, who is some shakes of a comedienne herself: "Madge is a wonderful actress. Put her into comedy and she has few peers. She has a gift for it. I love to play with her."

It is the Merkel girl, one of the real honest-to-gosh people in Hollywood, who is Madge's best friend.

Once upon a time, the studio, whooping up a little more of this synthetic aroma about Miss Evans, tried to whoop up a feud between the two girls. A whispering campaign was started which went like this:

"Watch those two dames. Sure, they are pleasant to each other's face, but there's real rivalry and jealousy between them. Two comediennes! Did you ever know it to fail?"

With less well-poised individuals, the feud and the ensuing gossip might have started something akin to dynamite. But Madge and Una laughed the unpleasant story off, and gradually the rumors died down.

Madge's boy friend is Tom Gallery, tall, quiet Los Angeles prize fights promoter and one-time husband of Zazu Pitts. They have gone together steadily for about four years and while they have never admitted an engagement or plans for a wedding, it is generally accepted in Hollywood that some day they will take the marriage vows.

Although Madge refuses to talk about her feelings for Tom to anyone at all, even her best friends, those who know her well, think that she is very much in love. She has dates with Gallery several times a week. They have been seen attending church together of a Sunday and he is at her home many evenings a week.

ONE story in Hollywood is that their marriage has been postponed because of Gallery's pride, that he wants to make his own pile and be financially independent of a movie star wife, before he asks her to be Mrs. Gallery. Another legend is that they are already married.

Whatever is true, you can rest assured that the Evans-Gallery combine is not another one of those publicity-concocted romances. Tom gave Madge a yellow sports roadster a few months ago and it was six weeks before the news leaked out and then inadvertently, as to the name of the giver. Madge has positively refused to let anything synthetic creep into her personal relations. More power to her. And let's hope the period of emancipation from gooey roles and pictures works wonders for her professional career, for that gal definitely has something on the ball.

This may just be a scene from "Love Is Where You Find It," but George Brent and Olivia de Havilland find it nice to be together, off the screen, too!

Between You 'n' Me

Perhaps, however, Grace does not want to share the honors with Nelson. If this is true, then she is the loser, because, although she may not realize it, there are still plenty of people who have never seen her—and many of them might be followers of Nelson's. So how about teaming them? What do you say, fans?—Ruth King, Cranford, N. J.

Putting Arkansas on the Map?

In the December issue, Grayce Higginbotham said that the "antics and so-called witticisms of Bob Burns are nothing short of treason to our state." Her beliefs are certainly unfounded. I, speaking as an out-of-state person, know that we don't look down on Arkansas because of him.

Instead of being treason to the state he has put it on the map. People didn't know anything about Arkansas but now, at least, they know it exists. Grayce, you don't seem to realize what it means to have the tourist trade Bob Burns has brought Arkansas. Appreciate him while you've got him because if and when he gives up movies, you will fall back into oblivion once more.—Marilyn Norbeck, Minneapolis, Minn.

Burnt Up

I have just finished reading "M'Lady Minus Make-up" in December MODERN SCREEN and to put it mildly, I'm burnt up.

I'd like to treat myself to a few choice cuss words, but being a lady, I won't, but who the blank blank does she think she is? I'm referring, of course, to Rochelle Hudson and her conceited remarks about what a successful actress she is, how popular she is with men and what an understanding husband she's looking for. I also resented her remarks and her poking fun at "a cottage small with roses round the door and babies on the floor." She admits that girls don't like her. All I can say is small

TINY LINES?

YES_____ NO_____

Can you see the faint lines at the corners of your eyes or mouth? If your skin is dry, then these little lines begin to take deep roots. Before you know it they have become deep wrinkles. The coupon below brings you my directions for smoothing out these little lines before they grow into wrinkles.

COARSE PORES?

YES_____ NO_____

Your pores should be invisible to the naked eye. When they begin to show up like little holes in a pincushion, it is proof that they are clogged with waxy waste matter. When your skin is cleansed with a penetrating cream, you will rejoice to see the texture of your skin become finer, soft and smooth.

DINGY COLOR?

YES_____ NO_____

If your general health is good, then your skin should have a clear, healthy color. Very often the dingy, foggy tone is caused by clogged pores. If you want to see an amazing difference—a clearer, lighter, fresher looking skin, then let me send you, FREE, a tube of my penetrating cream.

Have you a Lucky Penny?

Here's how a penny postcard will bring you luck. It will bring you FREE and postpaid a generous tube of Lady Esther Four Purpose Face Cream, and all ten shades of Lady Esther Face Powder.

Midseason Pick-Me-Up

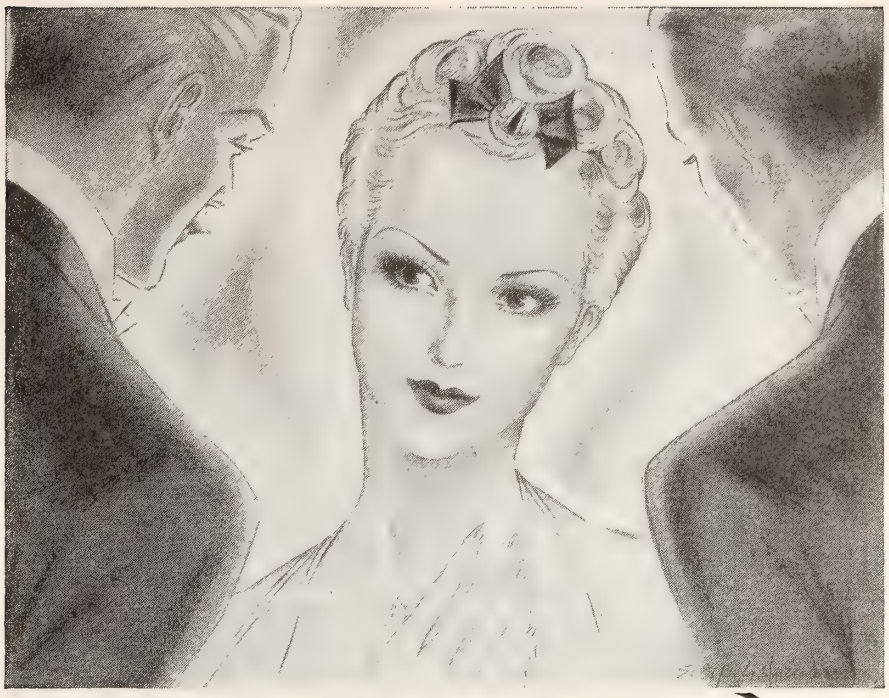
minute, looking into the future with her dashing scarf of red-white-and-blue, which forms a sort of vestee down the front of her dress. A piece of the same fabric is pulled through the crown of her bright red sailor hat and tied at one side, in back. Bright suede gloves and a plain dark purse complete this lovely picture.

The striped scarf can be draped in several different ways, but it can also be removed and others of different fabrics and colors substituted, so that the dress may be worn for afternoon with a scarf-vest of gold or silver lame, or for less formal occasions with a gay plaid or bright suede scarf.

Now, some of you may think that the girl who goes out and buys herself a winter suit as late in the season as January or February is slightly off her base and belongs in the psychopathic ward—that she's just plain nuts, in other words. But, if you're the least bit economy-minded, you'll see that there is a smart ulterior motive behind this apparent lack of the old grey matter.



For this is the time of year when winter coats and suits are put on sale, and you can find some wunnerful bargains if you shop carefully (and have any money left over after the financial strain of Christmas gift-giving!). You can wear your new suit for the remaining weeks of winter and in the still-cool days of early Spring, and then put it away fresh and clean for next winter, when prices will again hit the top, and you'll be so thankful you got your winter suit the end of last season.

GREY is tops with Hollywood's brunette contingent. Dorothy has chosen this grey cape suit as a perfect foil for her lustrous blue-black hair, fair skin and violet blue eyes.

Made of novelty grey kasha, the cape is lined in grey crepe and trimmed in grey Persian lamb, which also fashions the smart jumper and muff. The short straight skirt is also of grey kasha fabric, and her perky hat is of grey suede. Her touches of color on this costume are found in her bright blue antelope gloves, and matching bright blue slippers.

Skirt lengths being so very important at this moment, you have undoubtedly noticed that the skirt of this smart suit is quite far from the ground. Well, it looks as though the short skirt for daytime wear is here to stay—for a while, at least. And this means that we must pay particular attention to our hose. More unforgivable than ever is the sin of the twisted seam, the wrinkled ankle, the stocking that's too tight at the knee. Your hose must fit you perfectly if you're going to be well turned out from top to toe.

So I know you'll be glad to hear that there's a stocking that's made in all sizes imaginable, for short or long, plump or thin legs. All the problems of leg sizes have been carefully studied and a very comprehensive selection of sizes has been worked out. You lazybones who hate to shop will be glad to know that your shopping is greatly simplified, for all you have to do is phone for a representative, who will call upon you at your home, take your individual measurements, and order the proper sized hose for you in the newest Spring shades! If you would like to know how to secure perfectly fitting hose this easy way, just write Ann Wills, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New

THIS beauty-wise girl knows that popularity goes hand-in-hand with a clear, lovely, glowing complexion.

She protects and beautifies her skin with the new Linit Magic Milk Mask. It costs her almost nothing, yet keeps her face looking soft and smooth—lively and vibrant. It's ever so easy to enjoy this marvelous new home beauty treatment. While simple to apply, it's almost magical in results!

Simply mix three tablespoons of Linit* (the same Linit that is so well known as a Beauty Bath) and one teaspoon of cold cream with enough milk to make a nice, firm consistency. Apply it generously to the cleansed face and neck. Relax during the twenty minutes it takes to set, then rinse off with clear, tepid water.

HOW FIRM—how clean your skin will feel! The gentle stimulation the mask gives your skin induces the facial circulation to throw off sluggish waste matter and heightens natural bloom. This is an excellent "guide" to proper make-up, as the bloom indicates where your rouge should be applied. The Linit Mask also eliminates "shine" and keeps your make-up looking fresh for hours.

Beauty Problems of "In-Betweens"

still get away with handicaps that make a girl miserable. Guess it's still a man's world. But, never mind, darlings, go on and have a good time while you're waiting for the skin to turn to satiny smoothness.

Begin right now to drink, as soon as you get up, a glass of hot water with the juice of a lemon squeezed into it and a dash of salt added.

Be sensible about sleep. That's a funny statement, but I'll explain it. In the early teens, a great number of things are apt to crowd in upon us women. We're no longer little girls who are told to get to bed by eight. If we use the honorable old excuse of homework, we can get away with staying up till all hours. Fact is, at this age, if we have a great many activities on our minds, we discover that we can get along with very little sleep. That is, we think we can. I did it. Bed at two, up at five. Cramming for an exam. Staying overnight with my best friend, talking till three. Occasional parties, but the Ancient History 2B must be skipped through afterwards. I lived on so little sleep—woof, it would kill me to do it now. And, ladies, it isn't a good idea. You don't feel the reaction right now, but you will feel it later on.

I don't believe in an out-and-out strict diet for young folks. I think they need plenty to eat and when they're hungry, they should eat. But they can't eat everything they want to. Candy, pies, etc., are out if your skin is bad or your figure fat. They're not to be indulged in overmuch even if you're thin. It would be well if ice cream were served as an occasional family dessert and candy used as an after-dinner sweet. Then allowances could be spent for movies or MODERN SCREEN or manicures, and not for magoo at the drug-store.

YOUR mama is right when she tells you plump sisters that it's largely baby fat and will, probably, go away. But there's always that "probably" which leaves an element of doubt, so you should concentrate on vegetables, fruits, lean meats and fish. Eat plenty of these sensible foods. And you can exercise all you please. Keep your stomach muscles firm while you're young, and you won't have to worry about a bulging middle later on.

There's nothing better than this exercise: lie on the floor, with your arms behind your head, or crossed on your chest—anywhere where you won't use them to assist you in doing the exercise and so ruin the effect. Bring your legs up to a right-angle position with your body, heels together, knees straight. Do it slowly. Now lower the legs, slowly, very slowly. Let them down to within a few inches of the floor. Don't let them touch the floor. Now bring them up again. Do this five times without a rest.

And do this—you and your girl-friend do it together, helping each other. Sit on a chair sideways, your legs sticking straight out in front of you. Get your pal to hold your feet firmly while you do a back-bend over to the floor. Down and up, down and up, slowly, five times. Vary it by twisting to the right side, then to the left. That's good for a lumpy waistline.

Thin young girls, who just can't seem to gain no matter what they do, and who are nervous and unable to sleep and have headaches and cannot take a happy, healthy part in young activities, should see a doctor. And whatever he tells you to do, please do. Any sacrifice now will pay untold dividends later. Suppose he says stay out of school for a year? Okay, it will be kinda too bad, being a year behind your friends and everything, but better that than feel punk the rest of your life.

Average scrawniness and reediness of arms and legs can be built up over a period of eighteen months to two years by the faithful attention to milk, cream, eggs and nine hours sleep every night, with enough exercise of the most unstrenuous sort to give you an appetite and tire you out a little. Walking is cheapest and easiest. Archery, if your school boasts such an extra-curricular activity, is a splendid chest-developer.

And here's a leg-builder-upper, offered by your friend, Jeanette MacDonald, who, at the age of fifteen, had legs that strongly resembled pipestems. Now possessed of a pair of legs which should be insured whether they are or not, Jeanette vows that at fifteen her under-pinnings were first cousins to pipestems. She began doing, every day, a tiresome and, at first, difficult exercise and kept it up for a couple of years.

This is it: stand in your bare feet as close to the edge of a big, thick book as you can get without losing your balance. A soft, bendy book is best. A thick telephone directory or a stack of magazines two inches high will serve the purpose. Get way up on your toes and then ease slowly down till your heels touch the floor. Come up again and repeat ten times. That's enough for the first two or three days, because this exercise catches you in the leg muscles and makes them pretty stiff. Increase gradually to twenty, thirty, up to fifty times each day. Do it very slowly and feel the pull in your leg muscles. Think about those muscles while you're doing the exercise. When you think you're getting results, add another inch of magazines or another book.

DO I think you should use make-up? Yes! When? Depends upon your actual age, your activities, to a small extent upon the attitude of the community in which you live. The in-between age is an elastic period. In big cities, thirteen-year-olds may be quite grown-up young ladies. In small towns, one still can find "little girls" of sixteen. But generally speaking, I can't for the life of me see why a gal, who is no longer a little girl, shouldn't use external aids to beauty, provided she uses them in the right way. Powder. A touch of rouge if she's pale. Subdued lipstick for evenings and parties. The softer shades of nail polish—natural, rose, coral. Rust and the deep reds are too sophisticated and grown-up.

Powder should be a bit darker than the skin tone—just the same as for anyone else. Use a mild astringent if your skin is oily. Your powder should be applied by the "put it on and wipe it off" method. With a soft, clean, big puff, fluff more powder onto your face than you need. Then brush most of it off with a powder brush or a piece of clean cotton. Brush extra well over the cheeks, more gently over forehead, nose and chin. Never scrub powder into your skin and don't hastily powder a dirty face. It won't make it look a bit better, so you might just as well wait till you can clean up and start fresh.

The best lipstick for most young people is the variety which changes color when it's applied to the lips. You get a soft rose, not a red, shade that's very natural-looking. If this variety happens not to suit you, get the shade which is advertised as being particularly good for redheads. The point here is that most redheads, being notoriously hard to make up, find their lips turning slightly purple under most lipsticks. So a couple of far-sighted cosmetic manufacturers have made a lipstick containing quite a dash of that panchromatic brownish shade which the movie stars use before the camera. Put on generously, then blend and wipe off until only a becoming film is left, it looks pretty slick.

What about eyes? Older in-betweens may glamorize the windows of the soul a little. When one is sixteen, say. Younger girls should wait. If your lashes and brows are reasonably dark and plentiful, leave them alone in the daytime. If they're light and stringy-looking, however, use a brown eyelash grower on them for daytime. It will darken them a tiny bit and encourage their growth at the same time. For a date or a dance, keep a nice, soft, brown eyebrow pencil in a warm place, where it will soften still more. Feather this pencil lightly across your upper lashes. Lengthen the brow line with it just the least bit—oh, scarcely an eighth of an inch. If you find this messy and difficult to do, use the merest touch of brown mascara, just on the tips of your lashes.

Eyeshadow is out for the time being, but you can put a touch of rouge on your eyelids for evening. Never for daytime, dears, it makes you look as though you'd suffered a sudden bereavement. And even for nighttime, it should be slight. Use cake rouge and take a piece of cotton and scrub it over the cake, so that it's very thoroughly rouged up. Then pat the cotton on your hand or something until all the excess is off and you're getting the very least pink tinge. Or else you can rub a little cream or oil over your eyelids. Very little, for you don't want to look greasy.

If you have a very white skin, try this some time on an evening date: get one of those white pomade sticks, ordinarily used for chapped lips. Rub this on your eyelids, then use a little of the brown eyelash grower on your lashes and, really, it does a lot for a girl's eyes and a girl's outlook and nobody will be able to tell a thing, if you're careful and don't use too much.

I thoroughly expect the Editor to get a flock of indignant letters from indignant mamas asking what that buttinsky M. M. means by putting ideas into their children's heads. I don't mean to run counter to parental opinion, nor do I mean to put ideas into anybody's head. But I honestly feel that a girl, during the trying in-between years, needs every bit of help she can get in order to be a happy, normal individual and if a discreet make-up makes her look better and feel better, why not use it? I've certainly tried to stress the fact in this article that she shouldn't go too far and paint herself up like a freak.

Did I say that in-between years were tough on the gals? Well, they're pretty tough on mama, too, for she must use the nicest of judgment and be able to strike the most desirable balance between keeping Missy back too much and letting her go too far. It takes heaps of sympathy, tact, understanding and love—well, Mamas, a lot of it's up to you,

I was thinking, in connection with in-betweens, about some of our younger movie stars, as contrasted with the older girls. Kids like Deanna Durbin and Judy Garland. Their in-between years are so different from the similar periods of, say, Norma Shearer and Joan Crawford.

NORMA SHEARER, when she first went into pictures, had to wear painful braces on her teeth to straighten them. When Norma was a little girl, folks didn't go in for teeth straightening to such an extent as they do now. Such dental attention was very expensive and people of average means just didn't think it essential, that's all. It isn't dirt cheap even now, but with a little plotting and planning it can and should be managed.

And then there are our two famous in-betweens again, the Misses Garland and Durbin. Nice gals both, who offscreen look just like any two attractive, chockful-of-personality young people you'd find in high schools or boarding schools all over the country. A little make-up now and then, very nice clothes of good material and excellent cut, but always simple sweaters and skirts, plain tailored coats, simple accessories and hats. Remember that simple things are good for all ages. You won't look too kiddish in something plain. And Deanna and Judy are in bed most nights by ten-thirty and in the studio commissary they're seen eating vegetable plates and lamb chops and liking it and ice cream once a week, so there.

Do I hear some in-betweens moaning that, really, they're just so hopeless that . . . well, all this applesauce I've been writing is okay with girls who stand any chance at all. But—"I really haven't a single redeeming feature—almost everyone in the world has something, but I haven't hair, eyes, skin or figure," cries another. Listen! Till she was going on fifteen, one of our best dramatic actresses—to wit, Bette Davis—was one of these pale, skinny kids, with pale blue eyes and pale lashes and pale hair which just wouldn't fix. There was no confusion about it—Bette was just drab looking. But there was a brain working all the while under that hair, a dramatic soul in the straight-up-and-down young body. Today, it isn't Bette's looks, attractive enough though they are, which intrigue you. It's her dramatic intensity, her personality force which gets you. Use the external aids I've told you about, you kids who think you're so uninteresting, but more important, develop inwardly and in a couple of years, see if anyone dares call you uninteresting.

I gotta go now. But first—I have a small present for you. It's an absolutely free crystal bottle of perfume, and you'll receive it right away if you'll just fill in this coupon. Be sure to check your favorite flower fragrance on the coupon so you'll get the one you like the very best. P.S. These perfumes are the glam in glamor. Nobody's Yes-Girl pictures of the year, "Come and Get It" and "Ebb-Tide," her salary, with bonuses, still hovers around the four-hundred-dollar-a-week mark. And that doesn't go far in Hollywood toward keeping up a front.

VERY early in her picture career, Frances' Hollywood bosses became alarmed at the unpretentious way in which she was living. One day Phyllis Laughton, who was training talented newcomers at Paramount, called Frances into her private office, and said to her, "Frances, there's something I've got to tell you. It's . . . it's . . ." Miss Laughton seemed to find it hard to go on.

"Why are you afraid to tell me?" Frances asked. "You know I've never minded when you criticized my work."

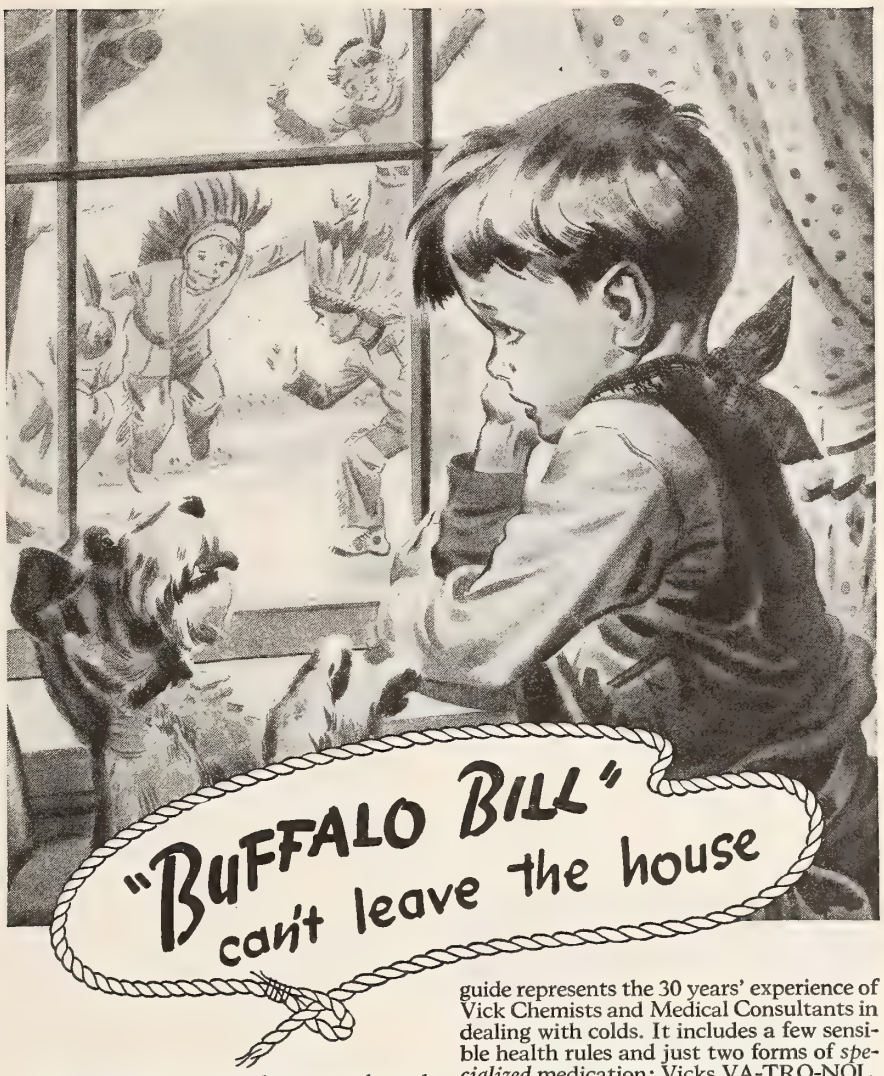
"It's not that," Miss Laughton said. "It's the way you dress on the street. Never wearing a hat and the horrible slacks and that faded jacket. You're being groomed for stardom, and the fans expect stars to be glamorous-looking when they see them on the street."

"So that's it," said Frances, smiling. "You know, Phyllis, you don't give a darn about the way I dress, so obviously someone from the front office has been talking to you. Who was it?"

Phyllis Laughton looked uncomfortable.

"Phyllis," Frances said, "do something for me, will you? Go to him and give him this message from me. Tell him if the executives at the studio paid as much attention to the parts they give their actresses as they do to the clothes they wear off the screen, we'd all make a lot more money."

Not for a moment did Frances stop to think that she was being impudent, and that she might imperil her brand-new career by being so frank. But if she had stopped to think of it, it wouldn't have checked her. For it isn't in the girl to bow and scrape and "yes" people to death.



There was the time, for instance, when a very powerful columnist asked her to appear on his program, so that he could introduce her to his listeners as the most promising newcomer of the year. Into the script he had put some pretty telling lines against Katharine Hepburn, which Frances Farmer was expected to deliver.

Now Frances likes and admires Katharine, and she didn't want to deliver those lines. At rehearsals, she tried to have them changed, but failed.

When the time came for her to broadcast, she didn't know what to do. Never in her life had she said something she didn't believe. On the other hand, she knew that if she antagonized this columnist, she might make a very dangerous enemy for herself, for his broadcasts were heard and his newspaper columns were read throughout the country, and it was said that he had a million fans.

When she got to the mike, the words she was really thinking about Hepburn tumbled from her lips in a flood; instead of condemning her, she praised her. All her life, Frances has been accustomed to saying exactly what she thought, and when she was put to a test, she couldn't do otherwise.

When she played with veterans in "Come and Get It," in a scenario written by a man who had had seventeen years' experience, directed by Howard Hawks, who had been directing box-office hits while she was going to college, she never hesitated to challenge the things these veterans said. At first they wondered at the gall of this young upstart who dared to say to the director, "What you suggested

THE Indians are on the warpath and the Cowboys are ready to fight—but Buffalo Bill can't take part. For he has a cold, and Mother is afraid to let him go out of the house.

Like every mother—every winter—she faces the problem of how to gain greater freedom from colds for her family. The right answer would mean less time lost from work, from school, and from play. It would mean less worry and less expense. It would mean better health for every member of her household—less danger from the after-effects of colds.

THE ANSWER—The right answer seems to be clearly indicated by the results of an extensive clinical study—in fact, one of the largest ever made on colds. This study included four series of tests. They were made under everyday living conditions, and included 17,353 subjects, more than 7,000 of them school children. In the course of the tests, a total of 37 physicians and 512 nurses and supervisors took part. The official summary of results shows not only fewer colds and shorter colds, but actually—

Sickness from Colds Cut More than Half (50.88%)! . . . School Absences Due to Colds Cut Even More (57.86%)!

These results were gained by following a simple plan that any mother can easily follow right in her home—Vicks Plan for Better Control of Colds. This practical home guide represents the 30 years' experience of Vick Chemists and Medical Consultants in dealing with colds. It includes a few sensible health rules and just two forms of specialized medication: Vicks VA-TRO-NOL, the scientific aid in preventing many colds; and Vicks VAPORUB, the family standby for relieving colds.

IN YOUR OWN HOME—What Vicks Plan can do for you and your family may be less—or even more—than what it did for thousands of people in these scientific tests. But its splendid record in this huge colds-clinic certainly makes it well worth trying in your own home.

Full details of Vicks Plan and its remarkable results come with each bottle of Va-tro-nol and each jar of VapoRub.

To help PREVENT many Colds isn't right. I don't feel it. The line should be changed."

As they discovered that there was intelligence behind that wide brow of Frances, the attitude of these men changed gradually from resentment to respect.

"Did you once say in an interview, 'I have been a rebel all my life'?" I asked Frances.

"Hell, no," she answered.

"Didn't you say once that a lot of people dislike you?"

"Of course not. Even if those things were true, I wouldn't say them. You, of all people, oughtn't to believe the things you read. You're supposed to write them, not to read and believe them."

Nevertheless, she has been a rebel, ever since that day in grammar school, when she penned an essay called "God Dies," in which she tried to prove that the individual ought to fight his own battles and not depend upon a beneficent Providence for aid. Because of the sensational title of her essay, she was condemned by both students and faculty, and considered a dangerous firebrand.

IN college, she majored in drama and appeared whenever she could in the shows given at the Studio Theatre of the University of Washington. Since her parents had very little money, Frances had to earn her way through college by working at such odd jobs as typing, appearing in radio skits, assisting in a dye factory, acting as camp counsellor to campfire girls, and doubling as a waitress and a singer of Indian love songs for the guests at a Mt. Rainier resort.

More than anything else, she wanted to get stage experience, and she realized that New York was the center of the theatrical world. But the money she had earned had been just enough to see her through college. How was she going to get there?

Opportunity appeared in a strange guise. The Voice of Action, a radical newspaper, offered a trip to Russia to the person getting the most subscriptions for it. Frances hustled around and persuaded as many people as she could to subscribe; not because she was interested in going to Russia, but because she wanted to go to New York.

When she won, her friends in Seattle were horrified. She was considered a menace by most of the people there, and held up as a horrible example of the inroads Communism was making upon our American colleges. But it didn't matter. What did anything matter, so long as she got to New York? Now she could bombard the offices of all the theatrical producers.

That was what she thought. But she hadn't stopped to realize that it was midsummer, and that most producers were out of town and wouldn't be back till September or October. In the meanwhile, on what was she going to live?

A man she had met on the boat going to Russia introduced her to Shepard Traube, who knew Oscar Serlin, at that time head of the talent scout department at Paramount. Amazed at finding an inexperienced actress, who was as beautiful and intelligent as Frances, Serlin suggested that she take a test.

"At the time I took the test I didn't take movies seriously," she said. "I didn't think I had a chance."

When Paramount offered her a contract, she realized that she would be a fool to turn it down, since such an opportunity might never come her way again.

During her first three months in Hollywood no one paid any attention to her, and she was restless. She made an average of two tests a day with unknown young men, and told the publicity department, "I prefer my own company to that of most of the men in this town. If they want to pass me by, that's all right with me. I think all the boys in Hollywood are terrific bores. If I couldn't stand my own company, I'd be the unhappiest girl in the world, because I'm alone morning, noon and night."

If there were nights of desperate loneliness and days when even the career on which she had staked all her happiness didn't seem sufficient compensation for the emptiness of her personal life, no one knew about it. She held that proud head of hers high, and said that the only thing in the world she wanted was to become a fine actress.

Matched with her in some of the tests she made and at rehearsals in the dramatic classes was a handsome, tall young actor named Leif Erikson, who was as ambitious as she was. After meeting him, it was no longer possible for her to feel that all the young men in Hollywood were bores.

WHEN they first began to slip over to Frances' apartment for additional rehearsals, it never occurred to her that anything else motivated them save the fierce desire both had to get ahead with their careers. But the other newcomers noticed that when they were teamed together in a scene, their work took on new fire, as though each caught inspiration from the other.

One day they eloped to Yuma and were married very quietly.

She and her husband stayed away from night clubs, gaudy premieres and the usual Hollywood social gatherings and spent most of their spare time practising their roles in the old-fashioned living-room of their home.

At first Frances was put into distinctly sappy roles, in pictures like "Too Many Parents" and "Border Flight," which were Grade B or worse. Just when Frances was beginning to feel she'd never get a break, Howard Hawks saw the test she'd made and asked if he could borrow her for the role of Evvie Glasgow in "Come and Get It."

Had Frances played that role she might never have gotten anywhere in pictures, but she prevailed upon Hawks to test her instead for the dual role of Lotta and Lotta's daughter. Given a silent test as Lotta, she registered a vital, unforgettable personality. Andrea Leeds was then given the bit role originally planned for Frances.

"Weren't you frightened playing such an important part after having done just bits and ingenues?" I asked Frances.

"No," she said. "It was too much of a relief to get something I could work at. I found it twice as difficult to do the dumb ingenue in 'Rhythm on the Range' as to play the dual role in 'Come And Get It.' It takes an awful lot to be a good ingenue. I guess I'm not the type, for it drives me crazy when I'm supposed to stand around looking pretty. I feel like such a chump doing it."

Frances is intensely loyal and when she heard that a woman who had been very kind to her had been fired from her job at the studio because of politics, she went straight to the executives and said, "I think that's a very dirty trick you've just pulled."

But when I asked her about it, she said, "I'd rather you didn't use the incident. She has a job with another company now, and the story couldn't possibly do her any good."

The idea that the story might do Frances Farmer some good, that it might help to clear up some of the fog of misunderstanding that has been built round her personality, never seemed to occur to her.

That simplicity of hers—the old clothes, the second-hand car, going around hatless, all that—is not an act. Frances Farmer can't pretend about anything.

Wanna Wedding Ring

nailed. Or she has, if she'll have him. For Robert has no time for anybody else, and there have been plenty of beautiful women who have tried to capture not only his heart, but a wee mite of his attention. Strong odds are that Bob will marry Barbara which will automatically remove him from the eligibility list.

Tyrone Power. The newest skyrocket in the Hollywood horizon. Here is a catch, make no mistake. In addition to his movie salary, he has a radio contract for this year which will bring him thousands of dollars a week. Thoroughly charming, attractive, desirable, as beau or husband. He has had one of the most rapid rises to fame on record. A year ago last December, when "Lloyds of London" was premiered, marked his start.

However, Janet Gaynor seems to have "dibs" on Mr. Power now. After keeping the press—not to mention Sonja Henie—at fever heat for so long, Tyrone had no qualms about stepping out with Janet the minute Sonja took off for Europe, several months ago. And so Janet became No. 1 girl. Is Tyrone Power an eligible or does he class as out of circulation, is the question that's worrying more than one Hollywood belle.

Ho, hum. In Hollywood, as in Jones Center, New Orleans, Paris or London, eligibility is often reckoned upon the basis of what a young man has accomplished, how much money he has already or can potentially earn. Girls who want wedding rings don't pay as much attention sometimes to the struggling young punks as they do to the boys who have received the breaks.

Take the case of Jon Hall. This gent, about whose brawny chest the publicity laddies have been raving, ever since he was cast in "Hurricane," automatically blossomed as a romantic as soon as the ink on his contract was dry. His name has been linked with Andrea Leeds. Publicity, you say? Perhaps.

Wayne Morris, six foot two, blond, blue-eyed giant, introduced to fans in "Kid Galahad," has been around Hollywood most of his life. He graduated from Los Angeles High School, started his acting at Pasadena Community Theatre, his movie career and his romantic career simultaneously (by beauing alternately Lana Turner and Linda Perry) at Warners. Better work quickly, girls. He's a first-rate eligible.

Here are a few more "in circulation" names to conjure with. Cary Grant. Since divorcing Virginia Cherrill, his name has been linked with many women. Things looked almost serious once with Mary Brian. Of late he spends all of his time with Phyllis Brooks, that blonde beauty.

Johnny Downs. Alternately beaus and squabbles with Eleanore Whitney. In his early twenties, has started to collect annuities already and will undoubtedly be a good husband for some girl.

Ronald Colman. If anybody can hook him. Best bet to date is Benita Hume. However, Mr. Colman is a wary feller who likes his pipe, his books, his tennis and his European travels minus female accompaniment.

Michael Whalen. Irish, good-looking, likes fun, parties, girls, is on his way up.

John Howard. Young, sensitive, idealistic, an actor to his finger tips, ambitious to become a great artist. Good to his parents. Won Phi Beta Kappa key at college. Doesn't go to many parties.

Recently slashed from bachelor ranks and removed from eligibility classification: Gene Raymond. Withstood the blandishments and flattery of literally thousands of women before he fell and went to the altar in one of Hollywood's biggest matrimonial splashes—speaking in publicity terms.

Yeah, I suppose you know, Jeanette MacDonald was the girl who drew the lucky number.

Tony Martin. Eloped with Alice Faye after a stormy period of courtship during which it looked as if the two would never get together on account of racial and religious differences.

John Howard Payne. Captured practically before he had his feet firmly on the ground in Hollywood, by demure, seventeen-year-old Anne Shirley.

Randolph Scott. Long-time bachelor crony of Cary Grant. Wed to a Dupont of the Wilmington, Delaware, Duponts, who specialize in Society, Wealth and Horses.

Fred MacMurray. The actor who was true to his former sweetheart, his love of the days when he was just an orchestra player, beautiful Lillian Lamont and who was repeatedly urged by his studio to delay his marriage lest it interfere with his amateur standing as a romantic.

There's Henry Fonda, who married Frances Brokaw, a New York blue blood. But then we could go on and on enumerating the married gents. There are just too many of them to make it any fun for the gals who wanna wedding ring.

For my part, I am looking forward to the day when Mickey Rooney grows up a little more. I am going to grab him early—that is if Judy Garland doesn't steal my thunder. Oh, well, there are still the Mauch twins.

Yet I happen to know a story that Hollywood doesn't know—that paints a completely different picture.

There is a script girl named Gertrude Wellman, better known as Trudy. She is a glowing girl who, with different training, might have landed in front of the cameras, instead of behind them. She worked with Hepburn on "A Woman Rebels."

As the picture progressed, Katie noticed that Trudy began to look haggard and drawn. Finally, one day, she said, "You look awfully dragged out. What's the matter?"

Trudy confessed that she had been ill for weeks. "I've been going to a doctor, and he says that I need an operation, but I'm afraid. Besides, I can't make up my mind that I need one."

"If you feel uncertain about this doctor's advice, would you go to mine, and see what he says?"

Trudy went. Katharine's doctor confirmed the original diagnosis. But that didn't make Trudy any less frightened of an operation. She told Katharine so. Katie talked with her, selling her the idea of the operation.

"You're probably worried about the cost, as much as anything else," she said. "But don't think of the cost. You can't afford not to go through with it."

Trudy went to the hospital, asking for the lowest-priced room. She was amazed at the size and cheerfulness of the room she was given. Katharine sent her flowers, called on her. Finally, Trudy was well enough to leave. She asked for her bill. There was none. No one would tell her who had paid it. But Trudy knew—even though Katharine has never admitted it. Pennywise Hepburn can also be generous.

Hollywood coddles its stars, but Katie refuses to be coddled. She has courage of an uncommon kind. She is the only feminine star who has never had a double, no matter how difficult a stunt the character she was playing had to perform. There still is a great deal of the tomboy in her. Any physically difficult feat is like a dare to her. She doesn't want to miss the fun of trying to do it.

In "Sylvia Scarlett," for example, it was Katharine, not a double, who swam through a turbulent sea to the rescue of Natalie Paley Everybody else called it foolhardy courage.

It was Katharine, not a double, who hung by her fingertips to a high window-ledge for another movie scene; Katharine, herself, who fought the tempestuous mock duel with Douglass Montgomery in "Little Women;" Katharine, who ran down a forty-foot flight of stone steps in high heels and a gown weighing fifteen pounds, in "Mary of Scotland;" Katharine, never in a side-saddle before in her life, who rode the spirited horse in the same picture.

WHEN she first arrived in Hollywood, Hepburn realized that she had to do something to attract attention. In a town where glamor girls drove swanky cars, she drove a station wagon. In a town where the height of informal attire was slacks, she wore overalls. In a town where poise was considered all-important, she sat on studio curbstones reading her mail. She exhibited a fiery independence new to Hollywood. She got attention.

But, having got attention, she didn't know what to do with it. She didn't know how to cope with it. She fled from it. She ran away from news cameramen, reporters, even admirers.

On her stage tour, she broke down and talked to reporters. But back in Hollywood, to co-star in "Stage Door" with Ginger Rogers, she gave no interviews.

Her independence of the Hollywood Press was no act in the beginning. She was not "trying to pull a Garbo," as the Press intimated. She was expressing a bitter resentment.

After her overnight success in "A Bill of Divorcement," she gave interviews. She was thrilled at being asked to give them. But one of her first interviewers happened to be a sob-sister, looking for sultry details of the Hepburn private life. The impertinence of her questions amused Katharine, new to Hollywood's prying curiosity. She answered the questions facetiously.

The sob-sister published, as sober facts, Katharine's facetious statements about her private life and past. "This is the finish," Katharine said, when she read the story. "If the interviewers aren't any brighter than that, why bother with them?"

Katharine is impatient with stupidity. Yet she has patience with newcomers who don't know what screen acting is all about. She hasn't outlived her memories of how she, herself, was helped.

Yet she can be unreasonable about being helped today. For example, the studio came to her for her signature on a publicity stunt that would have spread her name on posters throughout America. For some reason she refused. Yet, the next day, on her own, she took time to autograph a picture for a crippled child.

She lives alone, except for servants. She golfs alone, swims alone, rides horseback alone, goes for long walks alone. The ordinary person would suspect her of loneliness—if it weren't for the cocky perk of her chin, a characteristic of the self-sufficient. She looks confident of getting along by herself.

You would never expect such a girl to have a horror of being alone. Or, if she did, you would expect her to have too much pride to reveal it openly, publicly. You would expect her to mask her emotions, play the game to the end—if only in self-defense.

Yet she is incapable of putting on that particular mask.

She never appears in public alone, if she can help it. Alone, in public, she feels defenseless, helpless. Even on a walk across her own studio lot, she always has someone with her. Her stand-in, perhaps, or a studio maid, or a wardrobe woman. But someone. Always.

And even in the studio commissary, she will not eat alone. Along with two other women on the lot—Ginger Rogers and Jane Loring, production assistant—she has the privilege of sitting at the table around which the producers and directors gather. Katharine, unlike the other two, never sits anywhere else. Time after time, I have seen her step into the commissary, and glance quickly at the big corner table. If no one is there, she turns around and goes out, and doesn't return until someone is at the table. In private, she is self-sufficient. But, in public, she isn't.

To have a driving urge toward self-expression, a person needs great ego. Katharine has her share. She believes in herself and her abilities. She is more wrapped up in her acting, probably, than any other actress in Hollywood. Also, she is more high-strung, more short-tempered than any other actress in Hollywood. Yet she has no Narcissus complex, no complex about having all eyes focus on her.

Other famous women stars have been known to "kill off" promising leading men, by submerging them to their own personalities. Hepburn has had only one masculine co-star in her entire screen career. But go down the list of Hepburn leading men—Douglass Montgomery, John Beal, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., Charles Boyer, Fred MacMurray are a few of them—and you will discover that every one of them has gone forward, not backward, after appearing with her. For all her temperament, she gives the other fellow a break. That isn't like a glamor queen.

And, for all her ego, she abominates flattery. It is useless to try to coax her to do anything—to tell her, for instance, that if she does a scene thus and so, she will look beautiful. But try explaining that if she plays the scene thus and so, she will get an effect that she won't get otherwise, and you may have results.

Because of her fiery independence (which isn't all an act), because of her insistence on thinking for herself, she is not easy to get along with. At the same time, however, she has a sense of humor.

THE other day, on the set, she was having a verbal battle with her cameraman. He wanted her to do a scene a certain way, and Katharine, who knows something about camera angles herself, was putting up an argument. This went on for five minutes, their voices becoming louder and angrier every moment.

Suddenly, in the middle of a sentence, Katharine paused, laughed, and said, "Of course, you know you've been right all along."

"My God, Kate," he said, bewilderedly, "then what have you been going on like this for?"

"Argument is good for the soul," she retorted, "and, besides, I wanted to be sure that you were convinced, yourself."

How are you going to make out a girl like that?

She gives the impression of being a person who wants her way. Yet she also gives the impression of being a person who wants people to argue with her, if they don't agree with her. Another baffling contradiction!

Like a few other stars, she bars all visitors from her sets. Yet she erects no screens around the camera and herself for even the most intimate love scenes. She doesn't object to five hundred extras watching her. She doesn't hide away between scenes. She never goes to her dressing-room except for changes of costume. Her dressing-table is on the side of the set, in plain view of everyone.

She seems to have a passion for privacy; she doesn't want people around. Yet, once the sound-stage doors are locked, she is at ease, no matter how many people are on the set.

Still another mystifying Hepburn contradiction!

In Hollywood, success usually depends, to a large extent, upon how well you play your politics. Katharine is a sophisticate; she knows that. Yet she is persistently blunt and brusque. Despite the veneer of Bryn Mawr, New York and Hollywood, she still is New England through and through.

She is proud, yet she has little pride of personal appearance, except with her hair. She takes great care of that.

On the screen, she doesn't object to unflattering clothes. Off-screen, she usually goes around in slouchy slacks. Yet every designer who has worked with her says that she has the shrewdest clothes sense of any woman he has ever encountered. She has an instinct for "the right touches."

She could be one of the best-dressed women in the world, if she wanted to be. But she doesn't want to be. Apparently, she doesn't even care about a reputation for being well-dressed. No woman in Hollywood can explain that. Can you?

She rates as the queen of her studio, yet her dressing-room is the smallest and plainest of any on the lot. It is in the rear of the stars' building, not the front. Recently, the studio decided that the dressing-rooms needed refurbishing, and offered to make any changes that the stars desired. Ginger Rogers, Ann Sothern, Barbara Stanwyck, Anne Shirley, all were thrilled at the chance to get new drapes and new furniture of their own choice. But not Hepburn. She left the redecoration entirely to the studio.

It's the same with the house she rents. For all her vivid personality, she doesn't strive for vivid settings for it. Her ego doesn't run in that direction. She is almost masculine in her indifference to her surroundings. Yet, at home, she is her most feminine self. There she wears satin negligees.

She is intensely interested in music, yet plays no instrument well. She travels only by plane, yet owns no plane and flies none. She is an outdoor girl who shoots man's golf (her score is in the 80's), rides, swims, walks—yet her only collection hobby is fine-blown glass figures. She has about four hundred of them.

She is provocative and unpredictable, this Katharine Hepburn—a mystifying collection of contradictions. She is Hollywood's most baffling question mark. Sometimes she must even mystify herself.

approval as well as his talent puts Wayne among the cream of the crop.

Some folks don't believe in miracles, but Mr. R. H. Cochrane, President of Universal, did, once he met Deanna Durbin, Canada's young canary.

Deanna at the ripe old age of fourteen was in Hollywood, unknown to moviegoers, even though people tuned in on the radio to thrill to her lovely voice. The movie moguls had heard about this young Miss, but thought her too young to consider seriously. After all, it is difficult to cast a fourteen-year-old girl.

There was one person who believed in Deanna however, and he succeeded in getting Mr. Cochrane to listen to her sing.

"I decided to hear Deanna as a favor to this friend," said Mr. Cochrane. "We went into a rehearsal hall. What I saw was a little disheartening, for in this dismal room with a few chairs scattered around and a piano at one end stood a frightened little girl. She looked anything but movie material. Then Deanna began to sing. I forgot my surroundings. In fact, I forgot everything except that lovely voice. Needless to say, when she finished, we adjourned to my office and then and there signed her contract without so much as a make-up test."

It needed only her first rushes to show the studio that they had another star on their hands and, with the release of "Three Smart Girls," the fan mail began to pour in. That picture started her and "100 Men and a Girl" cinched the deal.

And so we present the cream of the crop, the successes of 1937, and predict that they will be big stars before 1938 ends. What do you think about it?

★★ Boots and Saddles

When a Hollywood preview audience applauds a horse opera, it's news. Gene Autry, however, rates the handclapping accorded him at the preview of his latest thriller, for "Boots and Saddles" is a fast-moving epic of the open spaces with a story that gets away from the run-of-the-hills stuff usually associated with westerns.

The crooning outdoor hero is foreman of a ranch inherited by a twelve-year-old young man from England. The young Briton is, of course, arrogant and high-handed, but a few weeks with good old Gene and the gang changes him over completely. In order to save the ranch from a dastardly villain, Gene must sell a herd of horses to the commandant of a nearby army outpost. The commandant also has a comely daughter, so you know what happens. During the course of events there is enough hard riding, clean living and straight shooting to warm up even the most sophisticated of movie-goers.

Gene Autry spends a good deal of his time engaged in singing, but he throws aside his trusty guitar long enough to save the ranch and win the beautiful gal, competently played by Judith Allen. Ra Hould is the young Britisher and Gordon Elliott goes to a villain's end with a proper sneer on his smirking pan. Smiley Burnette, who appears in all the Autry dramas, gets laughs with his broad comedy. Directed by Joseph Kane.—Republic.

Glenn Morris and beauteous Eleanor Holm, the newest Tarzan team, take time out for a little relaxation from work on their picture, "Tarzan's Revenge."

★★ Submarine D-1

Having exhausted all other branches of U. S. military service, Warners now examine the men who go down in the sea in submarines. As propaganda for the submarine service, the picture is a distinct failure—the submarine in the title does nothing but get into trouble—but as screen entertainment it has its moments of excitement and interest.

Plot is the customary one—two men in love with a girl. Pat O'Brien's rival is Wayne Morris, a personable young gent whose performance will gratify those who predicted a future for him after "Kid Galahad." George Brent is also involved in the proceedings, but he's not in on the romantic goings-on, for he's a stern submarine captain who has no time for such frivolity. Of course, everyone knows who eventually wins the girl and who (Pat O'Brien) wishes them all the luck in the world. The girl, incidentally, is Doris Weston. Directed by Lloyd Bacon.—Warner Bros.

HOW DO YOU LOOK IN YOUR BATHING SUIT

SKINNY? THOUSANDS GAIN 10 TO 25 POUNDS THIS NEW EASY WAY

NEW IRONIZED YEAST ADDS POUNDS

—gives thousands natural sex-appealing curves

ARE you ashamed to be seen in a bathing suit, because you're too skinny and scrawny-looking? Then here's wonderful news! Thousands of the skinniest, most rundown men and women have gained 10 to 25 pounds of firm flesh, the women naturally alluring curves, with this new, scientific formula, Ironized Yeast.

Why it builds up so quick

Scientists have discovered that hosts of people are thin and rundown only because they don't get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Without these vital elements you may lack appetite and not get the most body-building good out of what you eat. Now you get these exact missing elements in these new Ironized Yeast tablets.

They're made from one of the world's richest sources of health-building Vitamin B—the special yeast used in making English ale. By a new costly process this rich yeast is concentrated 7 times, taking 7 pounds of yeast to make just one pound of concentrate—thus making it many times more powerful in Vitamin B strength than ordinary yeast. Then 3 kinds of strength-building iron (organic, inorganic and hemoglobin iron) and pasteurized English ale yeast are added. Finally every batch of this Ironized Yeast is tested and retested biologically for its Vitamin B strength. This insures its full weight-building power.

No wonder these new easy-to-take little Ironized Yeast tablets have helped thousands of the skinniest people who needed their vital elements, quickly to gain new normally attractive pounds, pep and charm.

Try it without risking a cent

To make it easy for you to try Ironized Yeast, we do better than offer you a small sample package. We offer you a FULL SIZE package, and you don't risk a penny. For if with this first package you don't begin to eat better and get more benefit from your food—if you don't feel better, with more strength, pep and energy—if you are not convinced that Ironized Yeast will give you the normally attractive flesh you need—the price of this first package will be promptly refunded. So get Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist today.

Only be sure you get genuine Ironized Yeast. So successful has it been that you'll probably find cheap "Iron and Yeast" substitutes in any drug store. Don't take substitutes.

Special offer!

To start thousands building up their health right away, we make this valuable special offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out the seal on the box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Happy Relief From Painful Backache

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

★★ Navy Blue and Gold

The embattled and much-photographed grounds of the United States Naval Academy once more act as a backdrop for a drama in which the traditional cocky young plebe gradually loses his individuality and emerges, stamped, sealed and delivered as standard product of the institution, while bands play and thousands cheer. In this case the young man is Robert Young, and he reminds one of the golden—or "Anchors Aweigh"—era of the screen, when Dick Powell used to win the Admiral's daughter.

The film brings several additional characters to the usual story. There is Tom Brown, a young socialite from New York, and Jimmy Stewart, an ordinary seaman, who has come to the Academy to clear the name of his father, who had been dishonorably discharged from the Navy. While Mr. Brown and Mr. Stewart are there for the glory of it all, Mr. Young, the more practical member of the trio, has come to the Academy to play football and to meet an heiress who'll be impressed by his uniform. While Robert Young maintains his incorrigible mood, the picture is lively and a bit off the beaten track, but toward the end, along about the time Lionel Barrymore says to him, "My boy, you're Navy!" everything returns to familiar ground. Directed by Sam Wood.—M-G-M.

★★ Second Honeymoon

Tyrone Power and Loretta Young, who achieved matrimony in "Cafe Metropole," continue their romancing in this first-rate bit of light comedy. Something evidently happened to the idyllic bliss promised them in "Cafe Metropole," for when "Second Honeymoon" opens, we find they've been divorced and Miss Y. has already signed up with a new husband (Lyle Talbot). Number Two is a hardheaded business man, who probably wouldn't have taken his wife to Miami for a vacation if he'd known Number One would be lurking about. At any rate, Miss Young and Mr. Power meet again and discover they're still in love. After a series of sometimes hilarious events, the two of them hop off on a second honeymoon, an incident which must have puzzled Lyle Talbot—not to mention Mr. Hays—since the young lady in question was still his wife.

The two principals prove themselves an engaging romantic team, both of them playing their roles with charm and humor. Stuart Erwin furnishes excellent comedy as Power's valet, and here are fine performances by J. Edward Bromberg and Claire Trevor. A newcomer, Marjorie Weaver, is a surprise hit. Playing a bright-eyed but naïve young acquaintance of Power's, she romps away with several of the picture's best scenes. Directed by Walter Lang.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ The Last Gangster

"The Last Gangster" is exactly what the title implies. Although a foreword states that all characters are fictitious, it is plainly evident that the title role has been patterned after the career of Al Capone. It follows the life of that once-eminent citizen so closely, in fact, that Edward G. Robinson, who plays the central character, is transported off to Alcatraz for the same offense—income tax evasion—that sent Capone there.

The Robinson portrayal will remind audiences of his "Little Caesar" of a few seasons ago. His role is that of a gang chieftain with a Napoleon complex. He marries a strapping foreign girl for the sole purpose of providing himself with a son and satisfying his ego. When he is carted off to Alcatraz his wife divorces him and marries a newspaper man who has befriended her. Robinson spends ten years behind bars plotting revenge, and when freedom comes he sets out to find his family. Climax of the picture contains its most exciting moments.

"The Last Gangster" is not up to the standard of the old Robinson mobster films, but it has much to recommend it. Robinson, of course, plays with his customary skill. A newcomer, Rose Stradner, lends vitality to the role of the wife, and there are good performances by John Carradine, as a vengeful prison inmate, and Lionel Stander, as Robinson's aide. Jimmy Stewart, as the newspaper man, does what he can with a weak assignment. Directed by Edward Ludwig.—M-G-M.

★ Blossoms on Broadway

The blossoms implied in the title fail to bloom in the picture's unreeling, and what emerges is a dull and uninspired screen musical, the good moments of which are all too rare.

Story has Shirley Ross, with the help of Edward Arnold, impersonating a mysterious "Death Valley Cora" in a scheme to relieve a gold-hoarding millionaire of some of his capital. "Cora" is supposedly the owner of a gold mine, but Miss Ross' interpretation of the gal from the plains, unfortunately, is not the comedy riot of the season. Nor is Edward Arnold completely convincing as a big-time crook. Miss Ross, however, partly redeems herself by singing several songs pleasingly, the best one being the title number. Directed by Richard Wallace.—Paramount.

dith on his fine performance in "The Star Wagon."

Meredith is, perhaps, the most startling young thespian of the day. He has the Midas touch when it comes to picking plays. He claims Luck plays a big part, that a fellow can't go wrong if he chooses Maxwell Anderson's works in which to appear. He loves the theater, does Burgess. He likes the movies. There is a difference in affection there that the words convey.

"If you're on the stage, you've got to be in the best," he avers. "If you're in a mediocre picture, somehow it doesn't seem to matter so much.

"Somehow, it's not that way on the stage. Gosh, I was in four flops. None of them lasted two weeks, but you'd be surprised to know how many people saw me in them."

Meredith's latest movie is "There Goes the Groom." Ann Sothern was the lady in the case, and for Annie, Burgess has nothing but praise. "She showed me the picture ropes," he said gratefully. "And there's plenty of angles to learn about the business. Gosh, when I'd see the rushes after the day's work, I'd say, 'Never let me see that face again! Surely, I don't look like that!' But I did. So I gave up seeing the rushes and was a whole lot happier. But you can't discourage me! I'm going right back to make another!"

And who, we ask, would want to discourage so fine an actor as Burgess Meredith, or such excellent entertainers as Tyrone Power, Alice Faye and Janet Gaynor? Certainly not us—nor you.

De Mille picture; well, then he just doesn't know his trade, which, in the final analysis, is what acting amounts to."

This seemed as good a chance as any to get a puzzling question answered. "Why," we asked, "do many stars play themselves in almost any role in which they're cast?"

Freddie March, who is the soul of tact, considered for a moment, and then went decidedly courageous, throwing discretion if not careers, to the wind.

"They are often not," he said deliberately, "encouraged to do otherwise." There's choosing your words!

"Of course, there's a reason for it, too," he amended. "Some producers claim that the public wants to see Joe Dokes playing Joe Dokes whether he's doing it in an eighteenth century costume drama or a twentieth century drawing-room comedy. Personally, I don't believe it. I think the movies have educated the public to appreciate acting. You can't fool people any more. They've become critical and discriminating.

"I learned about audiences a long time ago when I played in stock. Each week I played a different bill. Each week I tried to land an entirely different role and play it to the hilt. One week it was a romantic lead, the next a comedy part, the next a character man.

"At first the audience seemed to slightly resent this, but only slightly. That gave me the needed courage. I thought if I could get them coming back by the 'surprise method', I'd really build up a following. They'd wonder what I was going to do next time and their curiosity would intrigue them into finding out. Yes, I was right. They did come back and they did seem to enjoy it."

March isn't interested in close-ups or prizes for best acting or luxurious living or most of the things many movie stars seem to live for. He has a comfortable home, not an estate, two adopted children and a talented wife. He met Florence Eldridge when they were both playing in Elitch's Gardens in Denver. They carried their make-believe romancing right offstage to the preacher's and have been living happily ever since. They are doing a play on Broadway together this winter.

"Florence is getting a kick out of it," explained her husband, "because her conscience is clear. By that I mean that she is working in the evening when the children are asleep and so not stealing any time from them. She wouldn't do pictures because she'd have to be gone all day and wouldn't know who cheated on the spinach or who skipped off without wearing her rubbers. She's certainly as good a mother as she is an actress and that, in the vernacular of the theatre, is the tops!"

responded with that modest smirk you know so well, lids drooped, lips coyly hushing his pleasure. "I thought I was rather juvenile in that," he admitted. Then, at a whispered remark of Lynn Overman's, he dropped out of character and really smiled. It banished from his features every trace of solemnity, it took fifteen years from his age, it was like the transformation of Sunny Jim after he ate whatever it was he did eat.

WHILE they were on location at Arrowhead the papers reported that Horton, Esther Dale and Lucien Littlefield had gone over a forty-foot cliff in a car and been gravely injured. They weren't injured, they didn't go over a cliff, they weren't anywhere near a car on the night in question. Horton's explanation of the rumored accident is worth hearing, nevertheless.

"I'd invited Miss Dale and Mr. Littlefield to have dinner with me down in the valley, where there's a very nice restaurant. Well, the company knew about it because we'd been lording it over them all day, 'ya-a-h, ya-a-h, we're going down to the valley,' 'n' that kind of glittering badinage, because things were a little dull and children must play. Came the dusk and somebody said: 'You're not going down tonight, are you?' 'We'd been thinking of it,' said I. 'Well, don't. There's a heavy fog coming up and it's going to be dangerous.'

"Now, however much I may look like a bold and dashing hero of adventure, appearances lie. Miss Dale, Mr. Littlefield and I dined together snugly on top of the mountain.

"Later we sat listening to the radio. Two girls, guests at the hotel, were listening too. Suddenly this report came in. The girls stared at me as if I'd been the ghost of Hamlet's father. 'But you're Mr. Horton, aren't you?' 'I am, and this is Miss Dale and this is Mr. Littlefield, how d'you do, how d'you do?' 'But then who went over the mountain?' 'Someone's imagination, probably,' I told them. Well, as it happened, there had been a trifling accident, nobody hurt. And somebody, hearing of it and knowing we had intended going down to dinner, logically concluded; 'Who could it be but Eddie Horton, the goof?'

"PERSONALLY, I'm glad it wasn't Eddie Horton. Been rather a pity at this stage of the game. Oh, yes, this is a crucial moment in my life. Didn't you know? My house is about to be finished. Only a year or two to go."

Horton's lovely home is the pride of his heart, and justifiably so. But he humbles his pride by mocking at it. He calls the place "Belleigh Acres," and directs visitors to "turn at the knoll and allow twenty minutes to laugh." To the architect's eye it's probably a monstrosity. "To mine it's been a jewel from the start," he declared. "I began it in a spirit of Christian modesty but picked up this regal complex along the way.

"Now we have twenty-two rooms. Don't ask me what they're for. We seem to be sitting around in them all the time. And then we have flocks of relatives whom we like to have come and stay. Oh, I mean that. We really do like it. And with twenty-two rooms, we can get away to another part of the house and talk about them in peace, and they can sit and talk about us in peace, and then we all meet happily again in the morning.

"There's one building I keep away from, and that's the barn. Not that I'm allergic to barns, you understand, but all the figures have been written down in a large book, and the book's in the barn, and I work on the theory that what I don't know won't

What made their hair grow?

Here is the Answer

"New Hair came after I began using Kotalko, and kept on growing," writes Mr. H. A. Wild. "In a short time I had a splendid head of hair, which has been perfect ever since."

Mary H. Little also has luxuriant hair now after using Kotalko. Yet for years her head, as she describes it, "was almost as bare as the back of my hand."

Many other men and women attest that hair has stopped falling excessively, dandruff has been decreased, new luxuriant hair growth has been developed where roots were alive, after using Kotalko to stimulate scalp action.

Are your hair roots alive but dormant? If so, why not use Kotalko? Encourage new growth of hair to live on sustenance available in your scalp. Kotalko is sold at drug stores everywhere.

You'll find me at the window regularly, hurling epithets which I assure you don't go with the landscape. Two henna cats named Null and Void for obvious reasons, who are very nice to me till my mother comes along. Then they turn tail and leave me flat, also rather irritated and abused. Five cows, so the cats can have cream, and the family what's left. Four horses. If I bring sugar, they'll follow me down to the fence. If I don't bring sugar, they won't even bother to say hello. I'm just the guy that works around there.

ONE is a real Percheron plowhorse, mother of a colt named Shangri-la, because he was born during the making of 'Lost Horizon.' The colt's aunt died suddenly, and to replace her, my brother bought a lovely little henna pony that this farmer thought he had to get rid of. My brother came home and told us how the farmer's little boy and girl had stayed up all that last night with the pony, kissing him goodby, and the pony kissed them goodby. He actually did, just like Black Beauty. My impulse was to send him straight back to the kids, but I knew the farmer would promptly sell him elsewhere. So I compromised by inviting them to come over and visit whenever they felt like it. Not that I'm posing as any fairy godfather," he frowned, fearful lest he convey the notion that he's tender-hearted. "It was just as a favor to the pony and us. It keeps him happy, and we have the pleasure of frequent visits from a nice little boy and girl.

"Otherwise, I'm the only child on the place. And I'm a handful. At any rate, so they tell me, and I'm the docile kind who believes what he's told. I'm also the kind who craves advice for the purpose of not taking it. Fortunately or not, I have two practical brothers. When I find a pair of lovely Adam fireplaces, I beam and say: 'How about it?' 'Sure,' they say, 'that's fine. Now how about a few gold doorknobs and a diamond-studded wall or two?' 'Well, I think that would be carrying things a little too far,' I tell them. 'We'll just take the fireplace.'"

I asked him whether he ever yearned to play something other than what he calls a goof. He threw me a suspicious glance. "Do you mean 'Hamlet,' or 'Romeo?' They're out. My legs tangle in tights."

Then, for the first time, he talked, straight. "No, I like these parts. And I love this business. And I want to be part of it as long as I can. My place is as a supporting player, not a star. I'm not the kind of personality people glory in seeing. I lack what is now known as glamor, what used to be called 'S. A.' and before that 'It,' and what by any other name would smell as sweet. I don't break my heart over what I haven't got, but thank God and the public for what I have. My ultimate ambition is to play comedy grandfathers. I may realize it or not, but so long as people are satisfied to see me caper, I'll caper. When they turn thumbs down, I'll sit in my garden and watch the roses grow and think of the lovely life I've lived. If I had it to do over again, I don't know a thing I would have changed."

Hoo—Raye!

threw my arms around him. I didn't sit at his table because he had a young woman with him, and I was afraid she might not like it. Do you suppose that is what made him angry?

"The only other time I've seen him since then was at the Hollywood Restaurant in New York. That time I left my own table and went over to his. I said "hello" to him, and though he had panned me in his column I tried to talk only of pleasant things. He was very cold and practically ignored me, so I had to excuse myself and go away.

"I certainly won't go down on my hands and knees to him. If he won't accept my friendship and my honest desire to find out what's wrong, then that's the end of it."

After seventeen years of struggle, Martha Raye has accomplished everything she ever hoped for. After years of hardship, going without food and wearing cheap clothes, she can, at last, have anything she wants. The furs, the fine clothes she dreamed about, the home she longed for when she sat in cold boarding houses.

But now that she can have everything she wants, the world criticizes her for taking it.

"Why don't you save your money?" the columnists scream at her. "Why are you buying all these things? Don't you know that you're just a vogue, that you can't last forever?"

"I know that I can't last forever," Martha Raye said to me. "But I also know that you can't take it with you when you die. Did you see the play, 'You Can't Take It With You'? Remember the old man who puts living pleasantly ahead of trying to accumulate a fortune? Well, he has the right idea.

"They say that I'm not saving my money. That's not true. I've put money away in annuities and government bonds. But it is true that I am not denying my mother or myself a thing.

"Why should I? When I was poor I bought five-dollar dresses in New York's cheapest shops. I used to think that if I could buy a dress in the swanky Fifth Avenue shops, I would go crazy with joy. Now that I can afford to go to those shops, that's just what I'm doing.

"If I saved my money, they'd say I was a miser. And since people will criticize you, anyway, I'd rather be criticized and have nice things than be criticized and have nothing."

Reports of Martha Raye's spending orgies have been exaggerated. Actually, she has one fur coat, a silver fox cape and a red fox cape. The day after she signed her contract she bought a white fox cape. When her mother admired it, she presented it to her. Shortly thereafter, her mother surprised Martha with the silver fox cape!

All her life Martha Raye had dreamed of having a town car and chauffeur. When she became successful, she bought herself a beautiful white car and hired a chauffeur. Now, it so happens that Sonja Henie also has a white car. In her case, it has been lauded as clever showmanship, but Martha Raye has been condemned.

"Newspapers asked, sneeringly, if I were doing a Garbo when I closed the 'Mountain Music' set to reporters one day. Well, I wasn't pulling a Garbo. While doing a very difficult adagio dance, I had sprained some ligaments in my arm. I went on working with a bandaged arm, but I hoped to keep the story out of the papers, because it might sound like a bid for sympathy.

"You see, I feel it's my job to entertain people. While they were watching me in 'Mountain Music,' I wanted them to enjoy themselves. I didn't want them to feel sorry for me. The set remained closed only one day, and was then opened again to reporters as usual."

Many of her fans are youngsters, and she has been rather sweet to them. One evening, as the curtain was going down, a boy and a girl rushed up to the stage and handed Martha a box of flowers. Terribly touched, she leaned down and kissed the boy and the girl. Then she invited them to visit her backstage.

To put them at their ease, she started to talk to them.

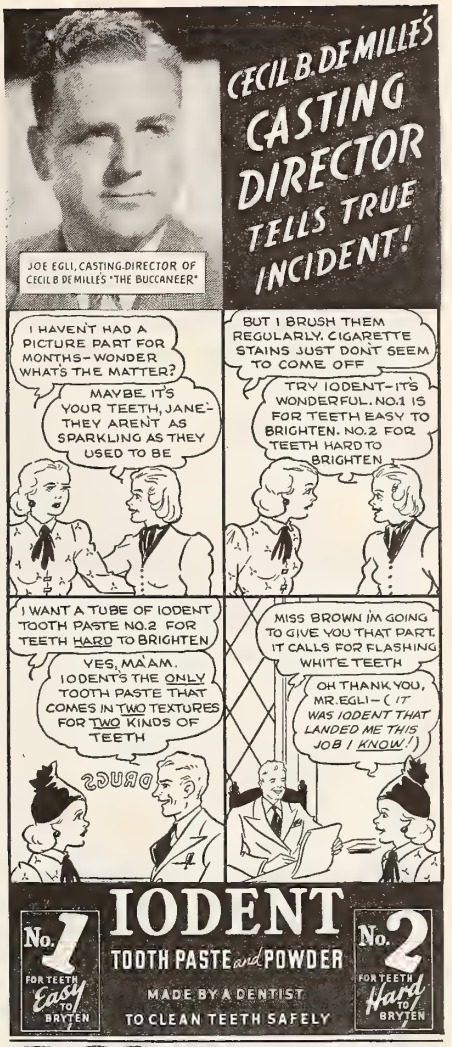
"I've noticed both of you," she said. "You've come back day after day and sat watching the show from early in the morning till late at night. What time do you get home?"

"Oh, around three-thirty or four in the morning," said the boy. "One of us lives in New Rochelle, the other in Newark, New Jersey."

"Oh, gosh," said Martha, "I hope you don't tell your mothers that it was on account of me you got home so late every night!"

Martha Raye was born in Butte, Montana, of a Jewish mother and an Irish father. Like so many other things in Martha's life, the devotion between her father and mother was destined not to last. Only recently her mother, Mrs. Maybelle Hooper Reed, won a divorce from Peter Reed.

When she was three, Martha was on the stage singing with her mother and father. At first the team was known as Reed & Hooper, with Martha thrown in for good measure. Buddy, her younger brother, was born when the family was stranded in Grand Rapids, Michigan. They had no money to pay for a doctor and chorus girls delivered the baby.



When Martha was sixteen, vaudeville was on its last legs, and she and her brother made just enough money to cover their meals. Since they had to hang on to their car to get them from town to town, they would sleep in it when they couldn't afford to go to a hotel. There were days when the whole family lived on a box of crackers, and, sometimes, two days would go by when they had nothing.

Vaudeville managers didn't always have the money to pay performers, and, sometimes, Martha and her family, having traveled all the way to some town to do their act, would be cheated of their pay. Martha grew expert at doing without things, but, being human, she indulged in day-dreams about a different sort of existence, in which she and her family would be able to live on the fat of the land and wear beautiful clothes and go to beautiful places.

Hollywood is a strange town. Sometimes it crucifies people. Then, when it's too late, it turns around and praises the very people it crucified.

Remember what Hollywood did to the late Jean Harlow—how bitterly it condemned her when Paul Bern died a suicide? For a time her career hung in the balance. But her fans remained loyal and, eventually, the critics capitulated.

You, the fans, saved Jean Harlow's career, and, today, you can save Martha Raye from heart-break. If you read a criticism or hear a criticism of her, know better than to believe it, unless there is definite proof. Give the kid a chance.

Part of Lily's Past

on its hind legs in his chair.

She had a canary, Tango, that she used to sing duets with. And then Tango broke his leg. His cage dropped out of the apartment window and fell five floors to the ground. Lily nearly died that time. She made a tiny splinter for his leg out of a matchstick and a sling for it and there she sat beside him. Not even for her meals would she budge.

Shortly after Tango recovered, Poppa took her to the zoo. On one of the high fences was a sign: Beware the Black Bears. "They are the most ferocious in all France," the caretaker explained.

"Do you hear that, Lily?" said Poppa. "But don't be scared. They can't get through the bars." And he looked around for her. They couldn't get through the bars, but Lily could. While the men had been talking, she'd quietly slipped into the pit and there she was, petting the bears and saying, "Nice doggy!"

AND then, abruptly, the little world of the Pons came to an end. It was very sultry, that summer night in 1914, when Mamma led the three little girls into the living room to say good-by to their father, a strange figure in a blue uniform. "I hate war," said Lily.

"But you must do your bit," said her father gently.

Streams of wounded soon began pouring into Cannes. The Hotel Carleton was transformed into a hospital and Mamma became head nurse there. They put the insignia of a captain on Lily and made her Chief Entertainer. Every afternoon she played and sang for the men. Sang for hours on end, trying to outwit pain, to brighten those white exhausted faces.

One day she came to the hospital carrying one of the dreaded "official communiques" for her mother. She watched while Madame Pons read it and went gray with fear. "Your father, Lily, he's been hurt and gassed, they do not know if he will live."

Lily went out and took her usual seat at the piano. "You must do your bit," he had said. She had to start "Tipperary" three times before the words would come. Then suddenly she was singing to her father, singing as if her voice could help him through. She sat at the piano for four hours that afternoon. And at the end, she crumpled to the floor in a dead faint.

An echo of the war came in the form of a letter from India not long ago. An attache there wrote, "Are you the Lily Pons, I wonder, who used to sing for us poor devils back in Cannes? Maybe your voice wasn't so wonderful then, but no audience ever appreciated you more!"

SHE still sings for them. The first thing she does each time she returns to France is to give a concert for the cripples who were the first to applaud the voice that the whole world now recognizes.

It was the day of days when they brought her father home. He was never to be strong again, but he lived long enough to witness her opening in Paris. Days resumed something of their usual course.

The Pons were living in Paris and Lily was a student in the conservatory at the time she created her first major commotion. She came home one evening and announced calmly, "I'm an actress. See, I have a contract with Max Dearly."

It was almost too much to believe.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause of your grouchy, gloomy feelings. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up." Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c at all drug stores.

With a whoop, she tossed her little beret in the air.

How she maneuvered an interview with him is still a mystery, but for two years he starred her in his "Varieties."

Her life is history from there on. Her meeting, and marriage, with the Dutch attorney, August Mesritz, on a vacation in Cannes. Her vocal studies and her subsequent debut in a benefit concert at the Hotel Ritz.

That was a night. The King of Greece was there and the then Prince of Wales and half of fashionable Europe. Lily came on, all sparkling and radiant in a cloth-of-gold gown—and bedroom sandals! In the excitement she had forgotten to change. And afterwards, as she went over to curtsy in front of the king, the sandals set up a little clap-clapping of their own!

Four days before she was to sail for her audition at the Metropolitan, her father died. It was her family who forced her to keep the all-important engagement. And once again Lily sang with tears in her heart.

THREE swift moving years. The glory of the Met at her feet. Brief moments home and the tragedy of divorce, due to separated interests. Triumphant tours throughout Europe, throughout America. She was in Rio de Janeiro when the invitation came from the mayor of Cannes. Her native city wanted her. Would she sing to them, to the people who had known her all her life? Lily cabled her acceptance and set a date. The proceeds were to go to "the boys" in the hospital. And then her South American tour was extended and there was no time to catch the boat home. But there was the Graf Zeppelin. "You can't sail on it. This is only the second trip it's made across the Atlantic and you risk your life!" protested her manager.

"Nevertheless, I sail!" said Lily Pons. And was sick all that night with the fear of it. During the two-day voyage she lost seven pounds, pounds she could ill afford to lose. But she arrived in Cannes on time. That was the important matter. A Cannes draped with flags and banners in her honor. They loaded her with flowers. And just before the concert Lily slipped away to place them all on her father's grave.

She found a cable awaiting her at home that evening. It was from a young man she had met in New York by the name of Andre Kostelanetz. "Congratulations," it read, "on the bravest thing a woman ever did." He knew how deathly scared she was of even airplanes. Two months later he became her musical director. Four months later they were engaged.

"He is a nice boy," said Madame Pons. "I hope they find time to marry when this picture is completed."

It was growing dark in the patio. From outside came the soft crunch of a car drawing up on the gravel drive. Somebody called, "Mamma, Nanette, where are you?"

Lily Pons had come home.

There's never a dull moment when Mischa Auer is around. The Missus is in on this bit of nonsense, too.

Ronald Colman and Benita Hume, snapped at the Opera. This duo continues to keep the rumor hounds guessing.

Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond joined filmdom's elite at the San Francisco Opera Company's opening. No matter how auspicious the occasion, Hollywood always manages an air of informality. Jeanette and Gene munched popcorn during intermission!

Simone Simon may be wonderful and beautiful and terrific and divine to Walter Winchell, as he reports her, but, alas, that is not always the final test. Why shouldn't she be nice to Mr. W? He has lovely long columns of space in which to print people's names. But you get a different slant on the diminutive Mademoiselle by listening to some of the Hollywood shopkeepers who have had contact with her. We know one who offers up a nightly hope that the little lady will never darken his door again. Whenever she comes in all the clerks run for cover.

There's considerable excitement going on about Marjorie Weaver, the young lady who created a surprise hit in "Second Honeymoon." Right now she's in "Sally, Irene and Mary," with Alice Faye and Joan Davis, and chances are she'll go on to stardom. Her case is interesting because she's one of the few contest winners ever to get anywhere in pictures. Two years ago she won a contest and a contract at Warner Brothers. After a few bit roles the studio dropped her. She was about to return home to Louisville when Darryl Zanuck signed her, and it looks now as though Louisville will have to get along without her.

Poor Ginger Rogers. She really deserves pity this month, for she's just received second billing to an ape. A Los Angeles theatre resurrected one of her old pictures and ran it in conjunction with an "educational" feature. The ads read: "The Love Life of a Gorilla"—and Ginger Rogers in "The Thirteenth Guest."

In "College Swing" you'll find Martha Raye and Ben Blue too chummy for words. Well, times certainly do change. It wasn't so long ago that Martha was hitch-hiking back to Chicago from Fargo, North Dakota, having been fired from Ben Blue's vaudeville circuit in that prairie town. Incidentally, it's Dave Rose with whom Martha's being constantly seen. He's a New York music arranger, and Martha did a little arranging to get him to switch to Hollywood.

Even after "turning on a laugh" 100 times a day, Myrna Loy*–MGM star–finds Luckies easy on her throat..

"I'd be a very Beautiful Woman if I'd taken care of my teeth and gums"

Neglect, Wrong Care, Ignorance of the Ipana Technique of Gum Massage—all can bring about

"PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

"Yes, dear lady, it's your own fault. You know that—now. You used to have teeth that glistened, they were so white. And your gums were firm and strong.

"Then, if you remember, there was a day when your tooth brush showed that first tinge of 'pink'—a warning that comes sometimes to nearly all of us.

"But you said: 'It's nothing. Why, I imagine everyone notices the same thing sooner or later.' And you let it go at that.

"Foolish you! That was a day important to your teeth—important to your beauty. That was the day you should have decided, 'I'm going to see my dentist right now'!"

No Wise Woman Ignores "Pink Tooth Brush"

IF you've noticed that warning tinge of "pink" on your tooth brush—see your dentist at once. For only your dentist can tell you when there's serious trouble ahead. Probably he'll tell you that your gums are simply lazy—that they need more work, more stimulation to help keep them firm and strong.

Many a child in grade school could tell you that often the food we eat is too soft, too well-cooked to give gums the exercise they need. Realize this—and you understand why modern dentists so frequently advise the Ipana Technique of gum massage.

For Ipana is especially designed not only to clean teeth but, with massage, to help the health of your gums as well. Each time you brush your teeth, massage a little Ipana into the gums, with forefinger or brush. This arouses circulation in the gums—they tend to become stronger, firmer. Teeth are brighter—your smile sparkles with a new loveliness!

DOUBLE DUTY—Perfected with the aid of over 1,000 dentists, Rubberset's Double Duty Tooth Brush is especially designed to make gum massage easy and more effective.

Shooting another love punch straight to your heart in "The Kid Comes Back"!

SWANK AT OXFORD

BY ANN WILLS

Maureen's suit of fine brown wool with its little coatee and checked waistcoat is extremely practical. (Right) Another favorite of hers is this two-piece ensemble. It's no wonder Bob Taylor fell for her in "A Yank at Oxford."

WHEN A noted Hollywood designer recently made up her annual list of the ten best-dressed women on the screen, she chose Maureen O'Sullivan as "A perfect example of the piquant type of woman," because "her clothes show infinite good taste in their simplicity of line and uniqueness of color combination."

In "A Yank At Oxford," Maureen is just herself, a charming, well-bred young British girl who wins the heart of the "Yank," Lee Sheridan, played by Bob Taylor. And you won't wonder that the handsome young American falls for the sister of his deadliest rival when you see the stunning costumes she wears in the picture. They are knockouts!

Fourteen exclusive outfits were designed by Rene Hubert for Maureen's role of an undergraduate in "A Yank At Oxford." So if you're seeking inspiration, don't miss this picture, for you'll certainly find lots of good ideas. The two costumes shown here are good examples of what the collegian should wear, simple in line, smart but not sophisticated.

Bright college years are made brighter by smart clothes, and what could be more so than Maureen's practical ensemble which she wears as a gay young undergraduate about-Oxford? The slim skirt is

SMART COLLEGIAN FASHIONS WORN BY MAUREEN O'SULLIVAN

I learned this at a college prom—

I simply fled! Escape—that was all I could think of! Just to get away from the gaiety and music—that marvelous music—of my first college prom! After all, when you're chafed . . . dancing isn't fun, it's agony!

"Simpleton!" said Marge, who was in the dressing-room making minor face repairs. "You'd think you were born in the dark ages! This dance came at the wrong time for me, too—but you don't hear me complaining! Haven't you heard about Modess?"

"Did you ask for Modess, miss?" said the maid handing Marge a blue box. "Good," beamed Marge. "And scissors too, please . . . Now, my dear, I'll show you two good reasons why you should get in the habit of saying Modess . . ."

"See this filler?" said Marge—cutting a pad in two. "Feel it . . . it's fluffy and soft as the down on a duck! Modess isn't made up of crêpey, close-packed layers—like ordinary napkins. It's so much softer. That's why Modess doesn't chafe!"

"Now, watch—" continued Marge, "here's reason number two! Modess is also safer!" So saying—she took the moisture-proof backing from inside a pad and poured water on it. Moisture-proof is right! I was simply amazed!

"Well, pet," said Marge, as we were getting our wraps, several hours later, "isn't it wonderful what a difference being comfortable can make in a girl's life! By the way"—she added—"here's something I forgot to tell you. You'll find Modess costs less, in most places, than any other nationally known napkin!"

Get in the habit of saying "Modess"!

IF YOU PREFER A SMALLER, SLIGHTLY NARROWER PAD, SAY "JUNIOR MODESS"

THE PARTY'S ON

BY MARJORIE DEEN

Courtesy "Toastmaster"

Grace Moore loves to entertain. Her recipes are worth trying. At left, a boon to hostesses without a maid, this Hospitality Tray is just the thing.

GOING TO give a party? Well, a little party booklet I am privileged to offer free to the first thousand or so who write in for it should provide some helpful suggestions. But we will have to wait until somewhat farther along for a more complete description of this booklet and how to obtain your copy.

Right now I want to tell you about the party foods suggested right in these pages by the lovely singer who so smilingly and graciously faces you across her own beautifully appointed table at the top of the next page.

One of the most enthusiastic hostesses I have ever encountered is Grace Moore who, unlike many of her sister screen stars, considers catering and cooking as really worthwhile accomplishments and regards entertaining as one of the fine arts!

Just give Miss Moore the slightest of pretexts for inviting her friends to the house, in fact, and the party's on. However, on festive days like birthdays, holidays and anniversaries, she really goes to town and entertains lavishly.

Decidedly Spanish in inspiration you will find the foods she serves. This of course is due to the fact that Miss Moore's husband, Valentin Parera, is a Spaniard and through him she has learned to take a real interest in the highly seasoned dishes of his native country. In fact so proficient has Miss Moore become, with the help of her Basque cook, Jeanne, that the recipes she has worked out are in great demand among her friends and there has even been some talk of a cook book incorporating many of the culinary secrets she has picked up in her travels.

After her most recent Hollywood farewell party we sat down together and swapped recipes like a couple of small town housewives. These of course are the self-same recipes that I am giving you on page 64.

Now you, too, can learn how easy it is to make Salteados a la Catalana! Don't let that name throw you, however, for this dish turns out to be a comparatively simple hot lobster concoction which has a delectable sauce and which also has the added fact that it can be made with canned (or frozen) lobster as well as with fresh, to recommend it.

At every buffet supper party there should be at least one hot dish, you know, so at your very next affair why not make it this one? A large bowl of Spanish Rice or some other starchy food could well accompany this shell fish treat and will serve to extend the servings. Miss Moore suggests further that if you are having a large and hungry crowd that you bring in the hot food in two small serving dishes rather than in one large one. In this way one of the dishes can be held temporarily in reserve, in the oven.

You will probably also enjoy having Miss Moore's directions for the preparation of the most delectable spreads and snacks, those one-bite treats that serve equally well as introductions to a regular company dinner or as probably the most popular features of an informal buffet. You'll find many of these ideas on page 64, printed in such form that they can be conveniently cut out and mounted on regular size filing cards.

Doubtless you've never eaten the Tocinos del Cielo which you'll also find described on that page in detail. I know I had never even heard of them before that particular party at the Pareras. Nor would I have dreamed that in translation that melodious name would turn into prosaic sounding "Little Pigs of Heaven."

When entertaining a crowd, breads too, play a most important role in your cast of foods, according to our lovely source of inspiration. Perhaps you'll like to serve small hot biscuits at your next buffet party. These should be split and buttered before being brought in, of course, since at such suppers your guests will not want to be juggling extra silver such as butter knives! Or better still make up a generous batch of the Pimento

Cheese Pinwheels for which butter is unnecessary.

Many of you, I know, will fall for the hot toast and Hospitality Tray idea that is now sweeping the country. This is one of those self-service inspirations that are such a boon to the hostess-who-has-no-maid. For, with sliced bread, an attractive looking modern toaster and some tasty spreads on hand, each guest can fix his own refreshments to suit himself. The illustration shows you a corner of a buffet with one of these trays all ready for an enthusiastic raid. Didn't have room, however, to show the cheese tray that I feel should be included with the other "spreads."

And this brings us to the little booklet I mentioned before which contains many suggestions for just such spreads, in combinations that are unusual and tasty. This fourteen-page booklet also gives directions for playing such popular adult games as "Guess Who," "Vocabulary" and "Lost and Found."

If you would like a copy just write The Modern Hostess in care of Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, New York, enclosing a three cent stamp. The supply is limited, so you'll know, if you have failed to receive a copy, that more than a thousand other hostesses were more prompt than you.

For Miss Moore's recipes turn to page 64.

HAS A MOVIE STAR WRITTEN TO YOU? WATCH THIS DEPARTMENT!

Bob Livingston (First printing). He was born lucky, to hear him tell it, and certainly, though he was scarcely a pampered son of wealth, he has probably had more lucky breaks than any other actor in Hollywood. Many young men would consider it pretty tough if they had to work their way through college. Bob, however, was philosophical. He earned his board and tuition by giving lessons in amateur gymnastics and tumbling. This was a lucky choice for it paved the way for later screen roles which demanded gymnastic ability. When he finished college, his father, being a writer, known as Ed Randall, creator of the famous "Say Bill" letters of World War days, Bob entered the newspaper profession. After one year as a reporter, he gave it up and decided, of all things, to become an actor. He went to the Pasadena Community Playhouse, known as the Little Theatre of the West, and playing any kind of roles he could get, he acquired a varied and thorough dramatic training. He soon attracted the attention of talent scouts from Republic Pictures, and he was signed to a contract. Because of his physique and obvious athletic appearance, this studio teamed him up with Crash Corrigan and Max Terhune in the famous "Three Mesquiteers" series. Since that time his popularity as a Western star has increased by leaps and bounds until now he ranks with the foremost exponents of this type of picture. He is a native of Quincy, Ill.

Judy Garland (Second printing). With the firm conviction that she wanted to be a film actress, Judy Garland walked onto the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer lot one day and announced to all and sundry that she was looking for a job. She got it and she was twelve years old at the time. Judy was born with the theatre in her veins. She heard it from the time she could understand what her parents, Frank and Ethel Gumm, and her two older sisters, Virginia and Suzanne, were talking about. The family was theatrical. Father and Mother were professional vaudeville folk and her father is now a theatre owner in Los Angeles. Judy first saw the light of day in Murfreesboro, Tenn., and has been in almost every city in the United States with her parents "on the road." She calls Los Angeles home, however, because most of her education was acquired there. She became a member of a singing trio composed of herself and her two elder sisters and the act worked at the World's Fair in Chicago and in several big theatres in the middle West. Suzanne married and that broke up the act. So Judy wasn't bluffing when she told Metro officials that she'd had eight years of stage experience. That claim got her an audition and her performance brought her a contract. The funny papers are her favorite form of reading matter and baseball, riding, swimming and golf are her favorite forms of exercise. She loves to eat chocolate cake and ice cream and she sleeps nine to ten hours every night. She likes people in show business. Her birthday is January tenth. She's four feet, eleven inches tall and weighs ninety pounds. Her hair and eyes are brown.

George Murphy (First printing.) It happened by accident. They let a pick-and-shovel man down into a Pennsylvania coal mine and when the cable broke below, they hauled up an actor. Michael Murphy's boy, George, who had graduated from Yale, came up in the bucket, after they'd dug him out from beneath a fortune in black diamonds. He spent six months in the hospital and was through with mining. George had seven dollars and a lot of aches and pains when he hit New York. He got a job as a runner in Wall Street and while working at this job he met Juliette Johnson, a clever dancer, who encouraged him to try his own prowess on the dance floor. They became a dance team and after a lot of struggle, were starred in the better Broadway night spots. During this period, they fell in love and were married in 1927. The team broke up in 1928 when George was given the juvenile lead in the Broadway production of "Good News." Juliette became merely Mrs. Murphy, which she has remained ever since, despite flattering picture and stage offerings. Following "Good News," Murphy appeared in "Hold Everything," "Shoot The Works," "Here Goes The Bride," "Of Thee I Sing," and "Roberta," all successful Broadway shows. A year ago he went to Hollywood, with no thought of a screen career in his mind. While there, he agreed to make a screen test with a girl who aspired to movie fame. Samuel Goldwyn saw the test and signed Murphy to a contract, but did not take the girl. His first picture was "Kid Millions." He has danced and sung in many others since then, his most recent being "Broadway Melody of 1938." Between song-and-dance pictures, he has done numerous straight dramatic roles. He is under contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. He was born in New Haven, Conn., the son of the famous Michael Murphy, Olympic coach and one time coach at the University of Pennsylvania. He studied engineering, though his great ambition was to be a baseball pitcher. It was in his capacity as a student, actually, that he went to work in a Pennsylvania coal mine, with the resulting accident that changed the entire course of his career. He weighs a hundred and seventy-five pounds and is five feet eleven and a half inches tall.

Collis Duncan, Tompkinsville, Ky. Loretta Young isn't married, though she's been reported engaged a number of times. She is twenty-three years old, is five feet, three inches tall and weighs a hundred and seven pounds.

A Slap In the Face for Flynn

Regarding "Robinhood Throws a Party," in your January issue, I have this to say about it. I've always considered Mr. Flynn one of the most self-satisfied, egotistical stars on the screen. (Perhaps he isn't, but that's my opinion and I'll stick to it.) However, I did admire him because he was adventurous, self-sufficient and independent—pretty much a free soul. Mind you, I never agreed with one thing the man said or did or wrote, but I admired his daring.

But, alas, what has happened? He used to be a rat, perhaps, but he's turned into a "wee, sleekit, cowrin', tim'rous beastie" (mouse to you). In Miss Zeitlin's article, she pictures him as living in an ordinary house, possessed of several pets, a butler, a wife and some nice, simple friends. No fights with Mrs. Flynn, no slurs against the fair name of woman, no cracks about Hollywood. The man's domesticated! Alack a-day, I loathed him, but now I pity him.

Mr. Flynn, I slap you in the face with my glove. Do you accept my challenge? —Anne Park, Elmira, N. Y.

Woo Hoo Hugh

He may not be handsome—he may not be sweet
He may not sweep a gal off her feet.
But I laugh and I chuckle when he comes into view
That's Hugh Herbert with his Woo Hoo! Woo Hoo!

I don't care for Gable, Powell or Flynn
Since somebody let this slaphappy guy in
And when I go to the movies I laugh till I'm blue
At the antics of Hughie with his Woo Hoo! Woo Hoo!

My whole family loves him and just can't get enough
Of his silly, daffy, pixilated stuff
My mother and dad roar outright; my brothers do, too.
Why he's even got my grandma shouting Woo Hoo!—Rose Ford, Providence, R. I.

Balanced Movie-Fare

Isn't the argument in favor of only Grade A pictures a little like the literary snobs who will read only best sellers? Right, perhaps, for those who see very few movies, but for the fans who see one or more a week, the Grade B pictures are like simple food on the health diet.

The more excellent the picture the greater its power to sway the mind and emotions. Too much of that is like eating too rich food. The milder, less impressive pictures can be as pleasant and comfortable as normal, daily life.

Also, like the stock companies to the legitimate stage, Grade B pictures are the best place for growing talent. I like to watch them develop and I feel quite the discoverer if I can pick a rising star. They contribute to the balanced diet in the movie-fare.—Beulah Barker, Chicago, Ill.

This is how one fan would register her disappointment in Errol Flynn—if she ever got the chance.

Not too Late

Resolutions I hope the following studios made:

RKO-Radio: Let Ginger Rogers knock at more "Stage Doors" and less stage floors. She's a swell actress.

20th Century-Fox: Keep on teaming Loretta Young and Tyrone Power.

M-G-M: Keep Joan Crawford in "from rags to riches" roles. She's my favorite screen cinderella.

Hal Roach: Find another "Topper" for Constance Bennett and Cary Grant. It would top 1938.

Warners: Let Dick Powell play more mature roles. He's forever the shy young man.

20th Century-Fox: Don't spoil Shirley Temple.

Paramount: Don't put Martha Raye in too many pictures. She deserves only the best.—Jean Minahan, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Bette Davis Rooter

It was a welcome relief to have Bette Davis at last emerge from those tense, somber dramas with the unhappy endings, and sally forth into light comedy like "It's Love I'm After."

Miss Davis possesses too grand a sense of humor, too sparkling a personality and too great a talent as a comedienne to be frittering away her ability on those Warner exposes of the shady strata of life. I do not mean to infer that Miss Davis should not continue to be dramatic. I only wish to say that she should avoid too many pictures of "The Marked Woman" type.

Her versatility should be equally divided between light comedy and intelligent, suspenseful drama, preferably with a happy conclusion. Since Warners own the rights to "Joan of Arc," I think they would be very wise to cast Miss Davis as Saint Joan. W. McCauley, Springfield, Mass.

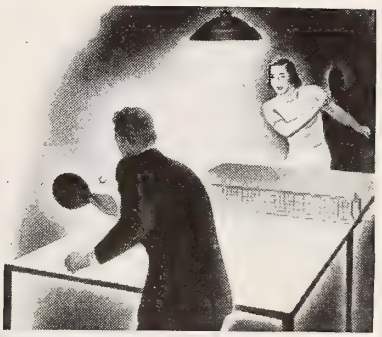
Paging Old-Timers

We are led to believe that the producers attempt to give the public exactly what it desires in motion pictures. But I am inclined to think otherwise. Why? Well, I have never yet met a fan who did not enjoy seeing a familiar favorite grace the screen, and once in a while enjoy seeing a new face crop up to take its place among the unforgettables. However, during 1936-37 the producers gave us an overdose of the latter. Old favorites, beloved by fans, were cast into the limbos of nonentities and inexperienced newcomers rocketed into prominence.



Of course, I agree that every talented youngster should be given a chance, but why always at the expense of our favorites? After all, it takes an experienced star to make a picture. New talent is always available but such grand ability as is possessed by the experienced players is very rare. We do want new talent, but not too much at a time.—Paul Nemuk, Little Falls, N. Y.

HE'S A SIMPLE SOUL

BY CAROLINE S. HOYT

Bob gets a kick out of hearing Carol Ann babble of the beauties of her young sister, Barbara.

BOB YOUNG handed me the slip of paper on which he'd just scribbled the following: "How to Lose Friends and Influence Nobody"—by Robert Young.

"Me and Dale Carnegie," he grinned. "He's a psychologist and a writer. I don't know much more about writing than how to tell one end of a pencil from the other. As for psychology, I've watched the antics of my own ego, and that's the conclusion I'm led to.

"Maybe I'm not typical. I've read about the timid little guy who finds he has a nose like Napoleon's, and winds up on the throne. And about the wallflower who tells herself, 'You're beautiful, you're beautiful, you're beautiful,' and the men come flocking. It doesn't work that way with me. Maybe I'm short on faith. If I said to myself, 'You're Napoleon, you're beautiful'—which, let me interpolate, I don't—echo would immediately answer, 'You're Bob Young, with the same old pan you always had,' and I wouldn't know the comeback to that one.

"What I do sometimes tell myself is, 'You're not a good mixer. You should cultivate dash and aplomb.' Mostly that happens after I've been playing one of these sons of wealth who dash with aplomb all over the Ritz and Italy and St. Moritz, never at a loss for the right word, thanks to the author.

"Here's what happens. I meet someone. Ordinarily we'd pass the time of day, and go about our business. But I'm a man of the world now, I've got to act in character. What would a man of the world do at this point? He'd toss off some gay and charming nifty, light as a bubble.

"I rack my mind for a nifty. Needless to say, my mind remains a blank.

"Or I go to a party, bent on being the life of it for once. I've primed myself with a couple of stories, and wait for a chance to spring them—airily, you know, as if they'd just popped into my head. The screen hero always gets his chance, but somehow I don't. Nobody seems to be in the mood for stories—not for mine, anyway. I stroll around, searching for a victim, and trying to look like myself in 'The Bride Wore Red.' Apparently without success, because people start getting that what's-the-matter-with-you? look in their eyes.

"Finally, I collar someone. Airy or not, I'm going to tell a story. By that time I'm in a state where, if Carol Ann asked me for 'The Three Bears,' I wouldn't know which came first. I flounder and I fumble and I miss the point and I pull out my handkerchief to wipe the beads

IF YOU HAVE A HANKERING TO BE SOMEONE YOU'RE NOT, DON'T CHANGE—AT LEAST NOT

Bob Young may be the screen's No. 1 playboy, but you should see him at home.

from my brow. My audience looks solicitous. 'You feeling all right, Bob? Oh, I just asked. You don't look so hot. Why don't you go lie down some place for a while?'"

A knock at the door was followed by the head of an eager young man, thrust through the opening.

"Excuse me, Bob. That your car outside? The green one? Boy, she's a honey! How does she run? What mileage do you get? How does the super-charging work?"

Bob satisfied the young man's thirst for information, and the head withdrew. Then he turned to me.

"There's a case in point. Me and my green car. I've got no business with that car. It's too flashy for me, costs too much to operate. I always feel like apologizing for it. I have to grit my teeth and say, 'be nonchalant, be nonchalant, be nonchalant,' to keep from explaining to everyone how I happened to get it."

I knew he was exaggerating for the sake of providing entertainment. Whatever grain of truth lay hidden among the chaff—and which of us doesn't recognize himself in a similar situation?—you wouldn't have to know Bob Young very well to realize that he and pretense are strangers.

Of all the actors I've met in Hollywood, he is the most un-actorish. He realizes that it's part of the player's province to exploit himself. Therefore, when he must, he talks about himself directly, frankly, without resorting to the coy capers of the hypersensitive. He doesn't have to assure you that he'd rather talk of other things. That fact is obvious after half an hour's contact with his inquiring mind. He doesn't have to assume a modesty which is his by instinct. In the essentials of character, he is the same young man he would have been if fate hadn't plucked him from a Building and Loan Company and set him among the stars.

As for the car, it happened this way. (And I'm not apologizing either). He went to the shop to have the top of his old car put down. "How about buying one of these?" they asked him, pointing to a dashing and, of course, high-priced model.

"No use for it."

"Well, come on over here anyway, and take a look."

He looked, he admired, and he turned away. They offered him a deal. You who own cars don't have to be told how it's done. They proved to him in black and white that he'd be losing money if he didn't buy this particular car.

He went home and talked it over with his wife. Deal or no deal, she was against it. "It always looks better to me in the bank than rolling around on wheels," said the sensible Betty Lou.

"Me, too," said Bob, with a far-away look in his eyes. Betty smiled. She'd said her say. If Bob wanted it badly enough to buy it, it was no part of her policy to stop him.

It took him a long time to make up his mind. His tastes were conservative. He'd never yet splurged on anything. But the lines of that definitely dashing car haunted and tempted him. So he bought it. (Continued on page 103)

NO. 1 Husband No. 1 was Brandon Peters. Miriam and he were soon divorced.

LET'S TALK ABOUT MIRIAM

THEY ALL DO, BUT WHEN MISS HOPKINS SPEAKS HER PIECE, SHE SAYS PLENTY!

BY NANETTE KUTNER

EVERYBODY talks about Miriam Hopkins.

They say she invited a group of writers to her home, and walked out before they arrived. They say when a newspaperman paid a call she sent her chef to the door, her chef, with a carving knife in one hand. They say she snubs her old friends. They say she is a shrewd business woman. They say when she was broke . . .

But no one says more than Miss Hopkins. She says:

Her neighbor is Norma Shearer, but she has never seen her on the screen. Neither has she seen Shirley Temple. For she rarely goes to pictures. She says she sees about five a year. Maybe this is a pose.

It's footlights and not Klieg lights now, for our star is in "Wine of Choice," on Broadway.

Miriam appeared in a New York restaurant wearing her adopted son Peter's (above) blue beret. Reviewing her husbands must make Miriam feel like Peggy Hopkins Joyce.

She says she met Anatole Litvak, her present husband (number three) on the Normandie. She met him by the simple expedient of picking him up!

"At the bar. We knew a lot of the same people."

She says he is a great director. And she points to "Mayerling" as an example of what he did for Danielle Darrieux.

"But he directed my worst picture." She says that also.

She says husband number two, Austin Parker, the playwright is living in her California home.

"Writing a play, while I'm East."

However, she disliked the mention of Actor Brandon Peters, who was husband number one.

"It makes me sound like Peggy Joyce. Besides, we were only married a couple of months anyway. In Chicago, when we were kids."

HUSBAND number three had just sailed for Europe.

"And I couldn't see him off. I had to rehearse. But he'll only be gone a month. And to tell the truth, I'm relieved. I knew he was dying to see New York. He's Russian, you know. We had only been here once before together, for ten days last summer during one of those hot spells. Now, this time, I have to stay home to study my part so he'd want to help me, poor darling. He'd sit around trying to be considerate. And I couldn't memorize. I can't learn in front of anybody. I like to walk around, to act all over the place, to talk to the furniture! My butler is used to this. He's been with me five years and knows me better than my husband. I can't just sit still and learn a part, then it sounds mechanical, like a phonograph record."

As to "Gone With The Wind," she says she would have loved to have played Scarlett.

"It's a fat role for any actress. But, although I got votes from every section of the country, although shop girls, hairdressers everywhere, they all stopped me and asked me to play her, although even my mother says I should have done it because we're from the South and her name is the same as Scarlett's mother, Ellen, even with all those reasons I can only tell the truth. I've never been asked. I just wasn't invited to the party."

SHE DOES tell an amusing story about it. One of the Hollywood producers gave a small dinner for the Dean of Columbia University. Eight guests were invited. And Miriam was one of the eight.

"Remember," warned their host, "no shop talk. This man isn't interested in pictures."

So the conversation carefully touched upon music and books and new methods of education, until the Dean astounded everyone by turning towards Miriam to ask, "And whom do you think should play Scarlett O'Hara?"

There was an embarrassing silence. The Dean, unaware that Miriam had been mentioned as a possible Scarlett, waited expectantly. The guests snickered. One catty woman, certain Miriam longed to play the part, went so far as to echo the Dean's question with a mocking, "Yes, Miss Hopkins, whom do you think should play it?"

This was a difficult moment. Miriam cleared her throat. And she plunged into what she honestly believed was the truth. She said she thought the producer would select an unknown as he must naturally want to build a star for himself, but she hoped, when he did choose that unknown, he would pick an actress with plenty of stock experience.

No sooner did she utter these words than "Gone With The Wind's" producer, David Selznick, entered the room.

There was an awkward silence, broken by the Dean, who cheerfully greeted Mr. Selznick with, "Miss Hopkins has just been telling us whom she thought ought to play Scarlett O'Hara."

"Every actress in America has (Continued on page 78)

The Gary Coopers (above) have just bought a ranch in Arizona to make up for the tramp-steamer trip they had been planning. Their new daughter has upset those plans temporarily.

Gary, all done up for "The Adventures of Marco Polo." Coop is one of the few actors who never wears make-up. He has that type of skin which photographs better without grease paint.

GETTING A GLIMPSE OF GARY

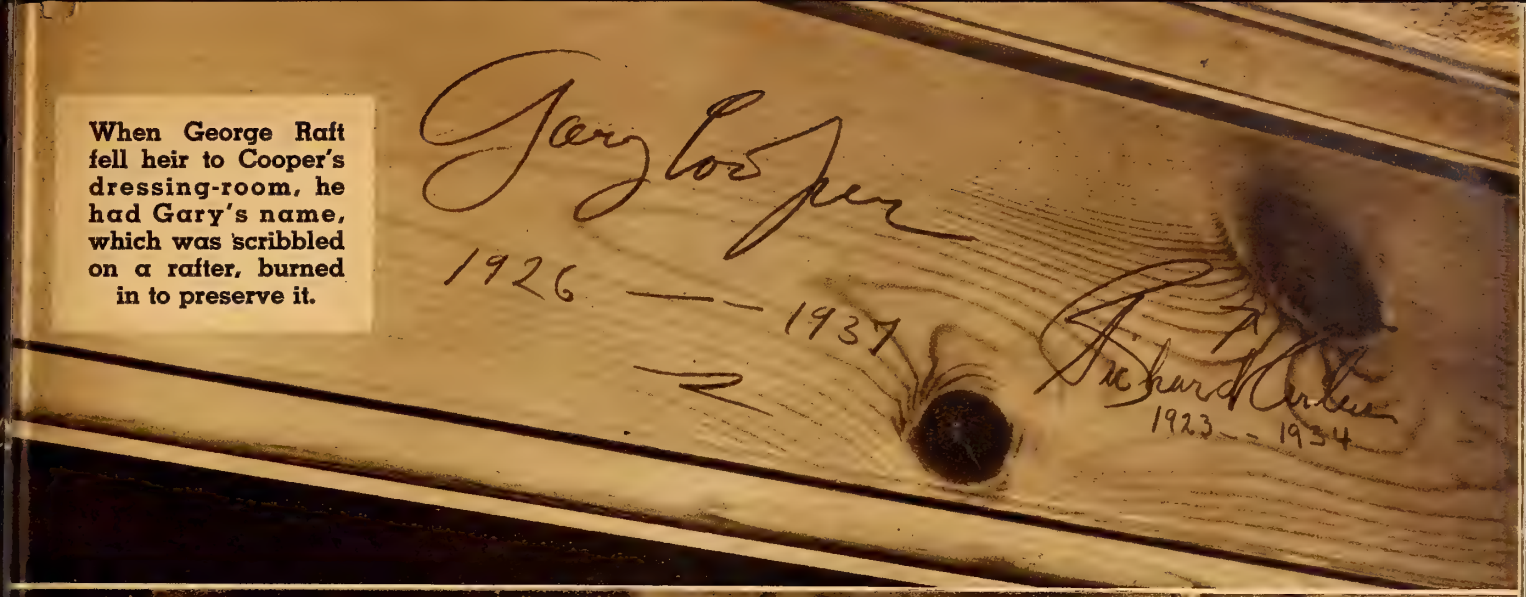
BY IDA ZEITLIN

OUTSIDE AN office building on the United Artists lot, a group of men were appraising the points of a shiny new sedan. One of them in slacks and sports coat, a white tie doing service as a belt, said little. But his eyes dwelt lovingly on the maroon beauty, glittering like a dragon in the sunlight.

"Gary," called a voice from a window above. He looked up. "How's the offspring?"

A slow smile crinkled the corners of his eyes. "Fine."

"New car for her?"



The smile deepened. "And her mother," was all he said, his lips closing with good humor but finality over some pleasant secret of their own.

The Cooper legend paints him as shy and inarticulate. These adjectives cover him roughly, in the manner of a shapeless garment, without revealing him. Talk to him about horses or cars or a new haunt for duck-shooting, and you'll find him articulate enough. If his tongue wags less than most, he can also pack more meaning into fewer words.

Instinctively, he keeps his hands off the personalities

COOP WON'T TALK, BUT HIS FRIENDS WILL—AND THEY GIVE YOU ALL THE LOW-DOWN ON HIM.

When George Raft fell heir to Cooper's dressing-room, he had Gary's name, which was scribbled on a rafter, burned in to preserve it.

Between scenes on a picture, Gary dozes off in his chair or fixes a bite to eat.

of others, instinctively he keeps the hands of others off himself. It's the policy of live and let live, applied in spirit as well as letter. Get any of his associates talking about him, and within two minutes you'll hear with monotonous uniformity, "Coop doesn't dish dirt."

The appearance of distinguished visitors on the set is the signal for Cooper to disappear. He will greet them courteously and seize the first opportunity to escape. Later he will be found deep in a discussion on amperes with Bill, the electrician. He bears no grudge against visiting bigwigs. He hates to fuss or to be fussed over, and takes the obvious method of avoiding both.

His vanishing act, even when there are no visitors to elude, makes him the despair of assistant directors. "Where's Coop?" the cry goes up. Coop is in a remote corner, drawing cowboys and Indians and dreaming himself among them. Or Coop has ambled off on his bike to pay Bing Crosby a visit. Or: "Any beds around? Look for the nearest bed, and you'll find Coop." Cracker Henderson, his handy man and entertainer-in-chief, is also the sleuth, self-appointed, to track Cooper down when he disappears. He does the job conscientiously, secretly convinced, however, that in a well-adjusted world a boss like his would be allowed to do as he pleased.

YES, THERE'S A VERY GOOD REASON FOR THAT SHYNESS, FOR WHICH GARY IS NOTED

The studio dreamed up Priscilla's and Wayne's romance, but they themselves made it come true.

Wayne brushes up on his technique, for Priscilla has a yen for music.

WHAT-A-MAN MORRIS

BY GLADYS HALL

IS WAYNE KEEPING HIS LAST DATE—OR WILL HE CONTINUE TO REIGN AS HEAD LADIES' MAN AND HEART-COLLECTOR IN HOLLYWOOD?

We call it madness, but they call it love! Well, maybe Pat Lane and Wayne Morris are right at that!

YOU—YOU hit me, you unspeakable brute!" wailed a piteous feminine voice and the piteous feminine voice came, I could see, from the slender blonde person of Priscilla Lane, cowering on the floor, and the "unspeakable brute" was Wayne Morris, towering over her, threat and thunder in his blue eyes. And then Director Stanley Logan called, "Print it!" and Wayne shouted lustily, "One-Take Morris and One-Take Lane!"

Priscilla got up off the floor, assisted by the eager hands of Wayne and the two stood there together, laughing, brushing each other off, admiring Priscilla's black eye, administered by Wayne and it looked like love, off the set as well as on.

Is this man Morris "hearting" again? If so, What-A-Man-Morris is the most masterly understatement ever made. Is it the caveman in him which has made him so super-successful with the ladies? Is he the "unspeakable brute" at whose feet the ladies cower, the while offering up their hearts? For certainly this blond young giant, standing six-feet-two in his stocking feet, weighing 190 pounds, tracing his ancestry back to that blond giant of the 10th Century, King Olaf, has captured more Hollywood hearts than have Robert Taylor, Tyrone Power and Jimmy Stewart combined. And their belts are not exactly denuded of some of the best scalps.

For Wayne, as you may know, has been rumored and reported as "hearting" with such belles as Nan Grey, Cecilia Parker, Eleanor Powell, Lana Turner and others. And now, for the past couple of months, his name has been linked exclusively and quite seriously, with Priscilla Lane. Priscilla, one of the Lane sisters, featuring Lola and Rosemary, seems to be following more or less in the Morris footsteps, having been signed to a long-term contract after her first picture, "Varsity Show."

I've heard people say, "This Wayne Morris, what's he got? He comes to town, is practically a star overnight, walks off with the best dates in town, how's he do it? What is it?"

Of course, there are the obvious factors of the six-feet-two, the 190 pounds, the warming-the-cockles-of-your-heart grin, the animal spirits which are as contagious as healthy fever, if there were such a thing. But even these are not enough to explain the swift, sure way in which young Wayne has wowed this wow-weary town called Hollywood. For the goodly institution called the American home, the colleges, the small towns, turn out six-feet-two young men, weighing 190 pounds, demons on the diamond, hellions on the hockey field, rascals with the racquet, by the gross. And of the gross only a scarce few ever reach the Hollywood studios at all and of the scarce few only a rare Wayne Morris ever lays low the citadel. So, what is it?

Well, be prepared for an exposé of Wayne Morris, offered by none other than Priscilla Lane, who reveals the why and the wherefore of Wayne. And if you can't get the answer from his best girl where would you be able to get it?

For shortly Wayne and Priscilla came off the set of "Everybody Was Very Nice" (the final scene of which I had just witnessed), in which they are being teamed, the first teaming, I gather, of many, for their next will be "Men Are Such Fools," in which, again, they will play a young married couple. "We're married in this picture, too," Wayne said, and his eyes told more than his words, for his eyes said that there was something very good about being married to Priscilla, even in pictures.

I said to Priscilla, then, "Tell me, honestly, what is this man all about? What is the secret of his power over wimmin?"

IT'S BEEN TOO EASY

BY MARY PARKES

WITH MONEY TO BURN, OLIVIA De HAVILLAND CAN'T BUY WHAT SHE'S LOST THROUGH SUCCESS

PEOPLE have been saying recently, that Olivia de Havilland is thinking seriously of abandoning the screen, forsaking her young career, which is mounting like a comet charged with dynamite.

"She's going to quit pictures," they've said. But why should she? A girl, just a pretty, well-bred girl who came to Hollywood from the sleepy little hamlet of Saratoga in northern California and played Hermia in Reinhardt's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and then signed a contract with Warners and is spoiled and petted and given the ripest picture plums on the lot, she should leave the screen!

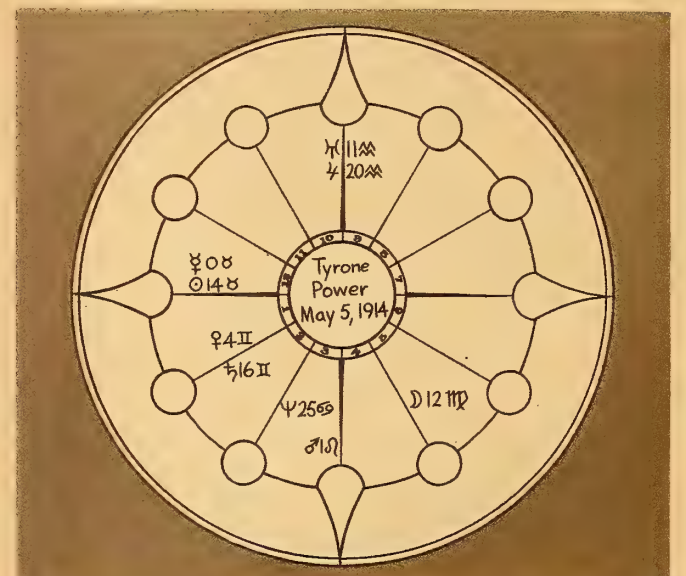
Supposing Olivia should fool us? There is something, disturbingly definite about Olivia. Her beauty on the screen may be maidenly and misty and dusted with the pollen of shrinking sweetness and suggestive of the soft pliancy of the clinging vine, but there is nothing of the clinging vine about the mind of Olivia, nor about her character.

The idea was so intriguing that I went to the Busch Gardens in Pasadena, where the "Robin Hood" company was at work. A sunny afternoon of green and gold and the pennants of the knights flying from their tall poles in the jousting field, and Olivia as Maid Marian Fitzwalter, in blue and silver robes, headdress and all, more beautiful than the dreams for which Knighthood went into Flower. Claude Rains and Basil Rathbone ranged to the left of her, a page boy kneeling to her, proffering a golden arrow on a royal blue satin cushion, Errol Flynn waiting to receive the ominous favor from her lily-white hand.

As soon as the company was dismissed, we had tea. Olivia had changed, very hastily, from the blue and silver robes of the Maid Marian Fitzwalter into a green and brown checked skirt, a white silk shirt, a scarf tied round her head, a fur coat, not very new, and she looked like any high school girl, an exceptionally pretty one, of course, going out for a sundae after classes. She looked much more likely to be carrying a bunch of books strapped together than a script or a make-up box. And she rode in a little roadster, waving off the studio limousines, the maid, the customary retinue and pomp and ceremony of a star.

And Olivia, off the screen, looks rather different from the way she looks on. It isn't that her beauty is less, it's that it's different. Her eyes, so dark and brown, are alive and alert and meet your eyes, squarely. She talks emphatically and honestly and (Continued on page 106)

Every day Brian Aherne and Olivia had tea on the set, but she was scared to death of him.



Basil Rathbone isn't too dignified to hook Olivia's skirt and the cameraman catches him at it!

Olivia, just being herself. And don't think she puts on fancy airs because she's a star. She doesn't!

WHOM WILL TYRONE POWER MARRY?

A reading of Tyrone Power's chart by our expert astrologer reveals some startling facts about this popular actor's future.

TYRONE POWER has them guessing out in Hollywood. First he went with Sonja Henie, till she travelled away for a visit to the Old Country. Then he fell for Janet Gaynor, while Sonja was dreaming of him on the high seas. Consequently, the buzzing is terrific. Is he going to marry? Is Sonja heartbroken? What are Janet's intentions toward him and vice versa?

Let's look at the triangle from the stars, and see what clues the three horoscopes yield about the tangle that has Hollywood guessers on the run.

To begin with, Tyrone belongs to the romantic sign Taurus, and Taurus men are hard to catch. More accurately, they are hard to hold, especially in their younger years. They will fight back with all their much-mooted stubbornness, if you tell them they're fickle, or philanderers. But ask the girl who owns one . . . or thinks she does.

Venus, planet of love and beauty, rules Taurus, giving her favorites glamor and an aura of romantic appeal. When Venus inhabits the sign Gemini, as she does in Tyrone's horoscope, the glamor isn't diminished. It sparkles and shines and glistens, but it is loath to settle down and focus its light permanently on even the most beautiful pair of feminine eyes in the world.

With the Sun in Taurus, square Uranus and Jupiter in Aquarius, and Venus in Gemini square, his Moon in Virgo, Tyrone goes into a love affair with all the fervor, all the ardor, all the sincerity in the world. Find a man with this combination, you girls who want a thrill, and you'll discover something about the fine art of love—

Why has Sonja Henie been able to maintain Ty's interest?

SINCE THE STAR HIMSELF HAS TURNED SHY, WE'VE CALLED ON THE STARS FOR THE ANSWER

BY GRANT LEWI

Tyrone Power has been linked romantically with Sonja Henie and Janet Gaynor. Will he marry one of them?

while it lasts! And when it's all over, though your heart may be broken, you'll never for a moment think that it wasn't worth it. You'll go to your grave glowing with the beautiful moments. This is rather trying on the man you may eventually marry, who has a pretty high standard to live up to.

Remember this when you think about poor little Sonja's allegedly broken heart, coming back to America to learn that her sweetheart had been (and still is) tripping hither and yon with red-headed Janet Gaynor, who is competition for any girl.

If Sonja had known her astrology, she would have taken Tyrone to Norway with her, and shut him up in a cave while she went to visit the old folks. But even the cold of the northland might not have kept his love on ice—and certainly not if Janet Gaynor had appeared on the scene.

There are very special attractions between Janet's horoscope and Tyrone's, which Sonja's charm could not have overcome, even if she had stayed on deck and kept her eye on the boy friend.

It's interesting to note that with Tyrone's Sun in Taurus, both these girls have their Moons in Taurus. That's an attraction, to begin with, and a very strong one. But it doesn't insure the delivery of a wedding ring. It's a nice brother-and-sister, palsy-walsy kind of attraction. If other less spirituelle and more earthly attractions conspire, this makes a fine basis for marriage. In itself, however, it doesn't promise anything.

Also interesting is the fact (Continued on page 76)

What attracted Power to attractive Janet Gaynor?

PROFESSIONAL MARRIAGE

THE PREACHER MADE THEM ONE, BUT ANNE AND JOHN ARE INDIVIDUALS WITH IDEAS OF THEIR OWN

BY MARTHA KERR

OURS," SAID Anne Shirley (Mrs. John Howard Payne, to you), happily, "is a professional marriage. Perhaps I should say it's a marriage of two professionals. Sounds better, doesn't it? Anyway, we met as professionals, fell in love as professionals, became engaged as professionals and will live happily ever after as professionals.

"That's the way we want it to be. Our mutual interests are, first of all, in each other, in Anne and Johnny, not as Mister and Missus, not even as picture players, just us. Our mutual interests, otherwise, are in scripts and stories and parts and contracts and progress, and these interests can be just as deep and satisfying as if our interests were rooted in building a wing on the old homestead or planning new linoleum for the kitchen floor. I'm sure Johnny wouldn't get half so much satisfaction out of my making the biscuits 'that mother used to make' as he got out of my performance in 'Stella Dallas,' which he was proud of!

"I feel sure that I can be just as good a wife to Johnny in greasepaint as I could be in a bungalow apron. At least, I'm the way I was when he fell in love with me and he's the way he was when I fell in love with him."

Now, here is something new under the sun, the moon and, especially, the stars. For years, Hollywood brides have made statements to their public. Glamorous ones, fresh from the altar, declare, "Now that I am married I shall be more wife than star; I shall stay in the home as much as possible; I shall probably give up my career in time." They continue, deceiving no one but themselves and not even deceiving themselves for very long.

"But no," Anne was saying, looking very little more than a child, in her yellow slack suit, tailored and slim, her russet-red hair curling loosely in a long bob, her russet-brown eyes as bright with happiness as any eyes I've ever seen, "we're not going to sink into any domestic routine. We don't want routine or responsibility. Marriage isn't going to change this pair of friends. We want to keep on having fun and we do have fun, lots of it. We go with the same crowd we've always gone with; we all do the same things as we've been doing.

"We don't want a house, Johnny and I, rented or bought. And we haven't got one. We're living in the apartment Johnny lived in before we were married. We want to be able to walk out of the front door and lock it behind us and go away when we feel like it and can get away. There are so many things we want to do, adventures and experiences we want to have. We want to go to New York as often as possible; we want to go to Honolulu and to the South Sea Islands.

"We want to discover new places. We want to have thrills and fun. If anyone should ask me what the leit motif of our marriage is, I'd say, fun. We don't take life seriously in the sense that we (Continued on page 84)

"In spite of Hollywood, I hope to find the happiness of sharing my life with someone I love and who loves me in return," declares Brian Aherne.

ELIGIBLE BACHELOR

BY FAITH SERVICE

I AM the most eligible bachelor in Hollywood. I'm the most eligible bachelor you ever met in your life. And I want to get married."

Brian Aherne speaking, and looking just as he's always looked, with his disconcertingly blue eyes, his lean tallness, his slightly crooked smile. But underneath the familiar exterior, how that man has changed! In the first place, he was supposed to be difficult to interview. Yet here we sat, in a lovely walled garden, with Mr. Aherne stretched out in a deck chair in the sun. He was wearing gray slacks and a polo shirt with a scarf knotted at the throat and he looked devastatingly handsome. Nor was he the strange, bookish, aloof chap we'd been told to expect.

He has the reputation in Hollywood of being an "escapologist." But that's because he never signs a contract for more than one picture at a time, and because, up to now, he has never taken time out for romance. The thought of domesticity and its subsequent ties always frightened him to such an extent that he'd run the other way. True, he went dancing with Marlene Dietrich and Katie Hepburn and Merle Oberon, but nothing serious ever came of any of these mild flurries. He was too elusive, too fond of his freedom.

Olivia De Havilland is rumored to be his current heart and though, in all probability it isn't serious either, for the first time, Mr. Aherne, himself, is. And, which is even more startling, he's willing to talk. About himself. About his hopes and plans for the future. He doesn't want adventure and excitement and constant change anymore. He's tired of it. Tired of living in a trunk. He wants to settle down.

So he said, frankly and honestly, "I want to get married. I want a permanent home of my own, built on land that is my own. I want routine, children, responsibilities. I want to unpack my trunks and stay put. I'm sick of making dates, going places, making more dates, going other places."

"Perhaps," we ventured, "you wouldn't really like it once you were really settled. You've had so much adventure in your life." And he really has, you know. Born in Kings Norton, Worcestershire, England, some thirty odd years ago, Brian De Lacy Aherne always had an eye on distant places. All through his school years at Hallfield and at Malvern (Continued on page 110)

WHAT SHE HASN'T GOT DOESN'T WORRY BEVERLY ROBERTS, BECAUSE SHE CAN ALWAYS SING FOR HER SUPPER

BY FRANC DILLON

UP AND down the boulevard we rode, looking for Beverly Roberts. Not that we expected to find her on the street, but we couldn't even find her house.

"It's a tiny place," she had said, when telling us where to find her, and she proved to be so right that we passed it several times. This was due partly to the size of the building but more on account of a sign over the gate reading: "Lending Library." And whoever heard of a motion picture star hiding behind a lending library? Finally, by a process of elimination, we located Beverly in the apartment above it.

At the top of the stairs was a large room, a charming room, with a fireplace at one end and a huge window that reached to the ceiling at the other. In front of the window was a wide studio couch which, dressed in a colorful chintz cover, served as a divan in the daytime and as Beverly's bed at night. The pictures on the walls were well chosen and the books on the shelves looked as though they had been read and re-read. There were flowers all about the room and a tea tray, loaded with things to eat and drink, was resting conspicuously on the floor.

The presence of a representative from her studio publicity department, to keep Beverly from talking too much, was a needless precaution. She never stopped talking long enough for anyone to ask questions and it would have been useless to try to stop her. Besides, no one would want to, for her chatter is amusing and entertaining, frequently hilarious.

She had lived in the apartment but two weeks, and was buzzing around nervously, patting a pillow, rearranging one of the three chairs or straightening a picture.

MOVIE-STAR BEAUTY FOR YOU

BY MARY MARSHALL

MAYBE I'M just an incurable old optimist to go on believing that every girl in the world can be at least attractive, possibly pretty and perhaps a distinctive beauty. But every time I consider the movie stars, I'm more and more convinced that some sort of beauty is possible for everyone.

If that sounds like nutsy reasoning to you, wait a minute: the stars were all basically good-looking to start with, but look how much they've improved upon that "basically" business. I can, offhand, think of only three girls in Hollywood who are authentic beauties, without benefit of make-up and fixin's. They are Dolores Del Rio, Virginia Bruce, and Madeleine Carroll.

The rest of the whole tribe are pretty, sexy, charming, brimful of personality, smart, but not authentic beauties. A few years back, most of them looked little more like their present day selves than Charlie McCarthy looks like Shirley Temple. They've become better looking people by virtue of knowing clever make-up, by taking pains with themselves, by playing up their good points and minimizing their bad ones. 'Tis this lesson in beauty, the movie star way, which I wanna drive home to you.

Let's start at the top with a certain pretty movie gal's hair. I've picked Luise Rainer, which may surprise you. I picked her because she's not a vivid blonde, a fiery redhead or decided brunette. She's a dark brownette, like millions of girls. Most of these millions pine and sigh for more vividly tinted locks. A goodly percentage resort to the dye bottle without ever considering whether or not a change in hair color will be becoming to their general type. So many dark brownettes, figuring that their locks are never going to turn any heads and break any hearts anyhow, neglect their hair on the "it's not worth fussing with" principle.

Marjorie Weaver's eyes are sumpin' to behold but she has problems that may worry you.

I wish all these girls could see the little Viennese star's hair! The lights in it, and its silky texture, and its adaptability to any change in hair-do Luise cares to make. This last virtue comes from basic care like daily brushing, thorough, but not too frequent shampoos, and intelligence where permanents are concerned. And speaking of changes in hair-do reminds me that I have something to say on that subject.

PARIS AND the flossier hairdressing maestros, or is it maestri?, say that "hair is going up." The page boy bob must go! That's the battle cry of the hirsute trade. Also the classic movie star bob, you know, practically shoulder length and all fuzzed out on the ends.

Well, my feelings are divided and I want to ask you to consider good and well before you make a change in hair-do. Some of the new styles are charming, true. Soft, flat curls are piled high. There's the French twist effect, a simulated roll up the back of the head, the hair all brushed smooth as glass over and into this roll. Hair is off the neck, off the ears, and up on top of the head, where our mother used to wear it. It is held in place with ingenious little combs. These new coiffures demand that the hair be in good condition, (Continued on page 90)

THEIR BEST INVESTMENTS

BY DORA ALBERT

THE STARS KNOW FROM THEIR OWN EXPERIENCES THAT IT DOES NOT ALWAYS TAKE MONEY IN THE BANK TO REAP THE BIGGEST AND MOST PERMANENT DIVIDENDS

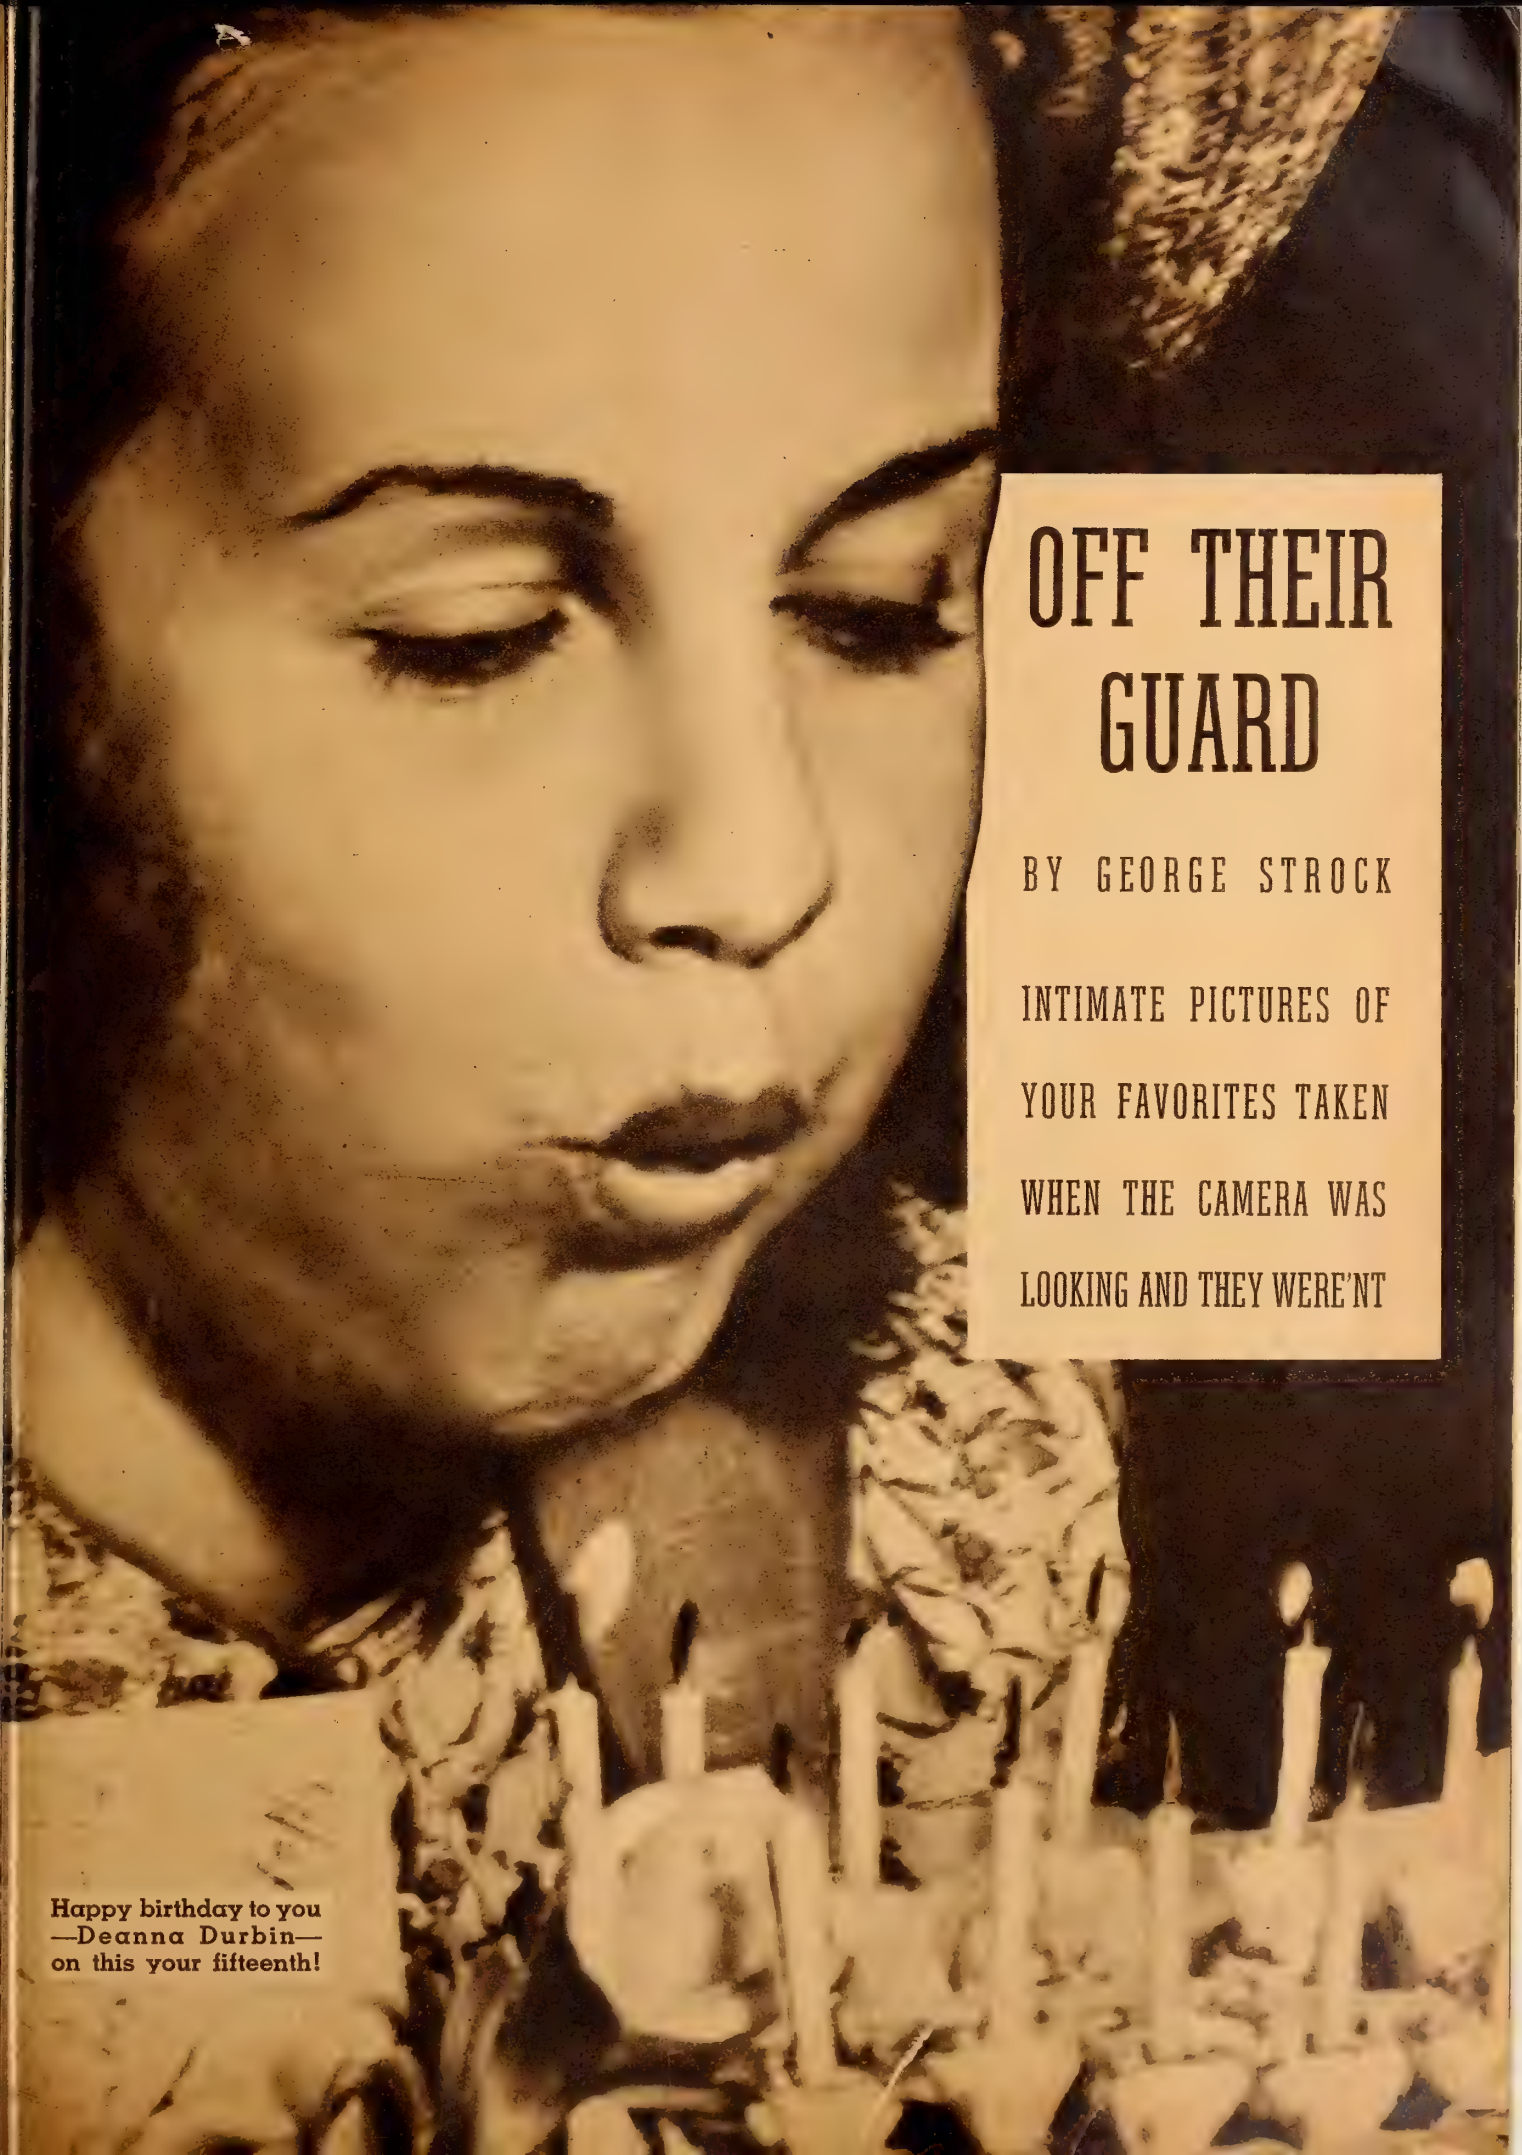
Rosalind Russell says her friendship with Charlotte Winters has been her biggest asset.

SO YOU'VE saved $500., and you can do with it anything you choose? You're wondering what the best investment of your money would be. So many people have wondered, particularly since the depression hit the country. Investments that had been considered safe were suddenly worthless. Banks crashed; bonds and stocks became so much paper; real estate dwindled in value. And the very people who had been most far-seeing, who had looked ahead to a safe, secure future, found that there was no such thing as security any more.

Now, people are again wondering just what is the safest and wisest way to invest their money. Each of us has his own pet theory. The other day I asked a group of stars to tell me what each one considered the best investment he had ever made.

Robert Taylor's best investment came when he scraped together enough money to leave Doane College in Nebraska, and to accompany his 'cello teacher to Pomona College in California.

"It was the first long trip I'd ever ventured," Bob said. "And it took weighing back and forth to decide whether it would be worth while. Fortunately, Mother and Dad did not object, and I left. Later at Pomona, I went in for amateur theatricals, and was seen by a motion picture scout.



"When I left Nebraska, movies were the thing farthest from my mind, since my interest was chiefly in the higher branches of music. Had I decided to remain in Nebraska and content myself with whatever music lessons I could get there, Robert Taylor wouldn't be in pictures. Another fellow, Arlington Brugh, would have been studying medicine, having no idea what he'd missed."

AS THE best investment of his life, Ray Milland selected a ten-months' spending orgy in the capitals of Europe, which resulted in the loss of a $17,000. inheritance, which had been unexpectedly left to him by a maiden aunt.

If he had been wise and conservative, he could have lived for years on this income. But because he wasn't wise, when his money had all vanished, Ray was faced with the necessity of earning a living.

He was in a quandary. Here he was in England with no money to his name, though only a short time before he'd been living like a millionaire. He knew he'd have to find some kind of work, but what could he do? Jobs were none too plentiful.

One day someone he had met during his (Continued on page 100)

Happy birthday to you
—Deanna Durbin—
on this your fifteenth!

Deanna Durbin's fifteen years old and the party's on! There's a birthday cake and special entertainment and flowers and Herbert Marshall, who is helping out with a little applause.

It's fun to have a birthday, Deanna thinks, as who wouldn't at her age! She's being congratulated with considerable enthusiasm here by Virginia Weidler.

With Mother and Dad. And from the beaming smiles, we'd say Mr. and Mrs. Durbin are a couple of proud parents! Deanna's every bit as tall as Mother.

Lucky Deanna! It isn't every fifteen-year-old who can rate a birthday kiss from Bart Marshall and from her expression, it looks as though little Miss Durbin knows it.

Producer Joe Pasternak presents Deanna with a shining new bicycle, so from now on, it's apt to be hard to keep track of her. Notice the doll, dressed exactly like the star, even to its hat.

And still the gifts are heaped upon her! The young man beside Deanna is Jackie Moran, her romance on the screen. Could he have sent the lovely flowers? He did indeed.

These are the grounds around the house that Shirley's jack built! Chin Chin's with her.

Like every millionairess, Shirley has her private yacht. Here she is cruising around her pool.

There is practically no outdoor sport that doesn't interest Shirley and medicine ball is among her favorites.

Better watch out, Gene Autry! Shirley's ready to go "Western" any minute now.

Then, there's the saddle. When Shirley means business, she goes into detail.

Spunky may not be as big as Gene's Champion, but Shirley says he's as fast.

CAROLE "CARRYING ON"

THERE'S NEVER A DULL MOMENT ON THE SET WHEN LOMBARD IS AROUND TO MAKE THINGS HUM

The end of a perfect day, and do Carole's dogs ache! It's all part of the plot of "Food For Scandal," starring Carole, Fernand Gravet and Ralph Bellamy.

A four o'clock coke. Carole works twelve hours a day, six days a week on this picture, and all for a mere truck load of good old American dollars!

Says Bellamy, "You've got to take your rightful place in society as my wife, or else!" Says Lombard, "Or else what?" And the fight is on, and how!

Somebody tells a story and Carole loves it, but Director Mervyn Leroy's heard it before. "Food For Scandal" is Lombard's first Warner picture and Leroy's last.

While their stand-ins work, Carole and Bellamy enjoy a bit of rest and a wisecrack or two, judging from their expressions. Miss L. is noted for her sense of humor.

Nothing like a cigarette to pep you up for the next scene, declares Carole. Bellamy however, is more in favor of the proverbial forty winks.

Gable meets dog. The lady at the right brought this English Sheep Dog on the "Test Pilot" set and Clark bought it for Carole Lombard for Christmas.

After the formal introduction, it would seem that Mr. Dog had taken a fancy to Mr. Gable. Imagine his enthusiasm when he laid eyes on lovely Lombard!

TESTING FOR "TEST PILOT"

"We would have to work on a day like this!" Tracy speaking and Clark agrees he'd much rather be on that hunting trip they've been discussing.

Myrna Loy, chic and charming as ever, relaxes with a cup of tea in her dressing room after hours of hard work under hot Klieg lights.

Myrna Loy and Gable assume their positions for a "take." Yes, they're married, in the picture, we mean, but they don't look too happy.

Gable and Spencer Tracy, good pals off the set, go in for a bit of he-man talk while electricians adjust the lights for the next scene.

Meet Mr. and Mrs. J. Walter Ruben, immediately after the ceremony at the Ruben residence. That's Virginia Bruce's little daughter, Susan Ann Gilbert, with them. Immediately after this picture was snapped, the bride and groom dashed off to dress for the elaborate reception held in their honor at Jack Warner's home. Mrs. Warner and Dorothy Di Frasso were co-hostesses with Kay Francis doing her share to help things along.

Virginia and her new husband had such a grand time at the reception that they didn't leave until six a.m. Pictured here are Mrs. Bert Taylor, Ruben, Virginia and Bert Taylor. In the back row are Kay Francis, Jack and Mrs. Warner. Unlike most bridal couples, the Rubens didn't stop with the reception! The next day it was tennis and a big cocktail party at the Alfred Vanderbilt's and still later that night, dinner at a nightclub!

HERE COMES THE BRIDE AND VIRGINIA'S FILMDOM'S LOVELIEST!

A veteran at it. Bing Crosby, who never asks his friends to bet on his own horses, places a couple of bucks on one he hopes will win.

HERE'S WHAT YOUR FAVORITE STARS ARE DOING AND SAYING THESE DAYS AND NIGHTS

The fact that Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy are being co-starred in "Test Pilot" brings to mind the fact that they both got into pictures by playing the same part. On Broadway, several years ago, Tracy played the hard-boiled prisoner in "The Last Mile." He was signed up for the movies and he's been doing right well for himself ever since. In a road show engagement of the same play in Los Angeles, Clark Gable played the role Tracy created. You know what happened to him.

Information Dept.: When Basil Rathbone's twenty-year-old son, Rodeon, came over from England to spend the holidays with his father, everyone wondered where he acquired his unusual name. From a spy, stationed in the Far East for just such an emergency, we learn that Rodeon is Russian. It means First Born.

An item in a Hollywood trade paper reported that Lili Damita had taken an airplane trip for an unknown destination, and that Errol Flynn didn't know and didn't care. What made the whole thing confusing was that Miss Damita read the item the same evening—while having dinner with her husband! That's the way those things happen in Hollywood.

Hollywood Affluence Dept.: Grover Jones, the writer, bought six sheep—to keep his imported English sheep dog company. And when he can't sleep Grover can count 'em!

Since Broderick Crawford's success in "Of Mice and Men" on Broadway, his mother, Helen Broderick, talks of nothing else. So now, on the set of "Radio City Revels," her name has been removed from her dressing-room door. Courtesy of Jack Oakie, it now reads: "Broderick Crawford's Ma."

Bob Baker is Universal's top cowboy star. After his first picture or two the studio was so pleased with its new Western hero that it was decided to give him acting lessons, just to polish up his histrionics. So he went to a studio dramatic coach, spent a month under her tutelage—and emerged with a Harvard accent! Since then, it must be reported, the dramatic coach has left for other fields, and Mr. B. has been thoroughly untrained.

Joan Davis' four-year-old daughter is fast becoming the most quoted young lady in town. The other day, she ran into Jane Withers. We don't know what's behind it, but anyhow, Katharine Hepburn got out on the set of "Bringing up Baby" one morning before Cary Grant. She tacked a big sign on his dressing-room door: "Grant's Tomb."

George Brent may be a ladies' man on the screen, but his luck with the alleged fair sex after working hours hasn't been so good lately. Within a period of two weeks, he is reported to have shelled out $37,000 to two women, and merely because they once wore the title of Mrs. Brent. When Constance Worth divorced George she was awarded $25,000—and two weeks later, they say, the government nicked him for $12,000. Ruth Chatterton's income tax for 1935, when she was Mrs. Brent. Good Deed Dept.: Janet Gaynor and her mother called on a friend recently and found him suffering with an annoying cold. Next day Gaynor's chauffeur stopped at the friend's apartment with a check for $150.00 and a note. Said the note: "The desert calls—this check will be honored only at Palm Springs."

When Myrna Loy goes to a preview without hubby, it's news. A publicity man was her escort.

Norma Shearer and Louis B. Mayer arrive late for the "Man-Proof" showing.

Mr. and Mrs. Bob Cobb (she's Gail Patrick) take in "Wells Fargo" preview.

Martha Raye Items: Martha's big love of the moment is—furs. She has just bought a mink coat and an ermine wrap to add to her collection, and her new limousine has fur upholstery. Reason she will be teamed with Bob Hope in future pictures instead of Bob Burns is that many fan letters complained that Burns was too old to be Martha's romantic interest.

Couple of months ago we reported an incident about an air commentator who was miffed because Garbo had passed him on the studio lot without speaking. The premiere of "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" drew the biggest mink and ermine turnout since "Hell's Angels." Everybody in town wanted to see Walt Disney's first feature-length cartoon, and almost everybody, from the looks of things, got there. GOINGS-ON IN GOTHAM

BY ROBERT McILWAINE

THE STARS ARE LURED TO NEW YORK, WHERE THE SHOWS, THE SHOPS, NIGHT-CLUBS AND MUCH GAIETY FILL THEIR DAILY PROGRAMS

Unembarrassed by those headlines which featured her in a fracas at that swanky rendezvous recently, Grace Moore goes night-clubbing with Hubby Valentin Parera again.

Loretta Young was in town for a vacation and Bill Powell had just returned from Europe, so they got together for the Horse Show at Madison Square Garden.

MOVIE STARS, like the traditional music, go round and round, invariably coming out in New York for a holiday. Fascinating as Hollywood may be, its cinema citizens strive to spend as much of their free time as possible amid the stimulating influence of Gotham's gaiety. And a whirl among the bright lights of Broadway, with a visit to the smart night spots, seems to be in order during their brief city sojourn. So, climb aboard and meet your favorites while we take a ride on the big Manhattan merry-go-round!

Besides being the screen's finest actor, Spencer Tracy gave evidence of a pixie quality when he arrived in town for a holiday recently. Spence was here to have fun and one of the locales he chose for it was the famous Stork Club.

It seems that every Sunday evening that popular nightery puts on a movie talent hunt in conjunction with one of the major picture companies. If you look like a picture possibility, you're invited to take a test. If the test "turns out," you're apt to land a contract and before you know it you're out in the land of sunshine and soundtracks appearing with Tyrone Power or Sonja Henie.

Well, to get on with the story, Mr. Tracy decided that, just for a gag, he'd "try out." And so, he parted his hair in the middle and plastered said wavy locks close to his head. Then he danced around the floor in full view of the enterprising talent scout. To his own amusement and everyone else's chagrin, he was promptly turned down. Finally Spence walked up to the t.s. and said, "What's the matter with me? Haven't I got beauty?"

Let it be here recorded that the bright red rope, which separates the sheep from the goats at the Stork Club, was no redder than the talent scout's face when he learned that he had turned down Public Thespian No. 1, for a movie test!

Speaking of night clubs and embarrassing moments, Grace Moore came in for her share of both at a recent Sunday visit to El Morocco. Seems that Gracie was entertaining her party by telling them a Donald Duck story related to her by Lawrence Tibbett. The show was on and, in order to be heard above it, Miss M. raised her voice and continued the tale, much to the annoyance of

★★★ Wells Fargo

Nothing is more exciting to the average theatre-goer than a good western. "Wells Fargo" is a super-western with all the trimmings, a picture which will be heartily enjoyed by everyone. It's a story of the progress of the stage coach and the Wells Fargo company, and parallel to it runs the history of America from the gold rush days to the end of the Civil War.

Better as a spectacle than as drama, the picture's most exciting moments are furnished by the struggle to string a stage coach line across the continent. The job of supervising it is entrusted to one of the company's young agents (Joel McCrea), and the personal history of his success is the thread on which the plot is strung. Picture reaches a smashing climax when the first stage coach rumbles into San Francisco. After that the Civil War is tossed in for good measure. The film really ends when the Wells Fargo line completes its work.

Joel McCrea is an excellent choice for the role of the hardy young hero, and Frances Dee, as his wife, plays her role with charm and assurance. Bob Burns does a swell comedy lead as an indolent helper of McCrea's, and Pawnee, the Indian, played by Bernard Siegel, brings a refreshing brand of humor to the film. Directed by Frank Lloyd.—Paramount.

★★★ Love and Hisses

Walter Winchell and Ben Bernie, those highly publicized feudists, continue their bickerings in a bright, fast-moving musical which will please everyone who saw their opening siege last season.

This time Simone Simon is the young lady in the case. Billed as Yvette Yvette, she is a French songstress sponsored by both Bernie and Winchell. Each of the boys believes he discovered her, and their troubles over her give the picture its story.

Messrs. Bernie and Winchell seem to spend more time at each other's throats than at their respective professions, much to the merriment of the audience. The music is good and there are enough nice moments to make this musical a worthy successor to "Wake Up and Live."

Mlle. Simon sings in a small but rather effective voice, although she'll never cause unemployment among the Grace Moores and the Jeanette MacDonalds, as her press agents have been hinting. The two principals perform with assurance, and there is a first-rate portrayal of the romantic lead by Dick Baldwin. Bert Lahr, as Bernie's assistant, and Joan Davis, as Winchell's secretary, furnish good comedy. Best musical number is "Broadway's Gone Hawaii," sung by a personable Miss named Ruth Terry and by the Peters Sisters, an ample colored trio. Directed by Sidney Lanfield.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Mannequin

What Joan Crawford needs, said everybody who worries about it at all, is a good box-office picture. "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" and "The Bride Wore Red" were definitely bad, and we'll fight the man who says they weren't—if there is such a guy in existence. So it is, therefore, nice news for Miss Crawford's followers and for the woman herself, that "Mannequin" is an entertaining picture. It's good because it's the type of thing in which Miss C. is temperamentally well cast—the story of the poor shop girl who rises above her surroundings to achieve wealth and happiness. So, the role, being completely within her limitations, she does a creditable job with it.

However, it is Spencer Tracy who really makes "Mannequin" what it is. His grand trouping is always a pleasure to watch, and fortunately, in this case, he's given enough footage to carry the picture along with him.

Others in the cast who do well by themselves are Oscar O'Shea and Elizabeth Risdon, as Joan's parents, Leo Gorcy as her sarcastic young brother, Mary Phillips, as a girl friend, and Ralph Morgan, as a business associate of Tracy's. Alan Curtis, making his screen debut as the villain, gives himself a nice send-off. Directed by Frank Borzage.—M-G-M.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★ Tovarich

After two years on the Broadway stages, "Tovarich" comes to the screen as an excellent high comedy, admirably performed by Claudette Colbert, Charles Boyer and a capable supporting cast. In case you don't know, "Tovarich" is Russian for "Comrade." Miss Colbert and Mr. Boyer are the exiled Grand Duke and Grand Duchess. The Grand Duke has forty billion francs tucked away in the Bank of France, but he won't touch it. It was given to him by the Czar, to be used for the good of Russia. So the "poverty stricken" royal pair take jobs as butler and house maid in the home of a wealthy Paris banker. The real comedy of the picture begins at this point, after a slow start, and from there on "Tovarich" is hilariously funny and definitely one of the better pictures of the year.

Best performance is Charles Boyer's, with Claudette Colbert doing her best to keep the supporting players from stealing the honors. Of the cast, Melville Cooper is splendid as the banker, and Isabel Jeans is charming as his wife. Anita Louise and Maurice Murphy, as their children, turn in fine performances, as does Basil Rathbone, as the Soviet Commissar. Directed by Anatol Litvak. —Warner Bros.

★★★ You're a Sweetheart

Part of this picture is too good to miss and part of it is—well, just ordinary. On the credit side of the ledger should be noted the performance of Alice Faye and George Murphy who make an engaging dance and romance team. Ken Murray should be mentioned, too, and Andy Devine, Charles Winninger and Frances Hunt contribute some lighter moments. On the debit side we would list some of the plot and about half the songs. For the film drags interminably toward the end in spite of the capable cast getting right in there and pitching for dear old Universal. Song and dance numbers miss fire because of being too frequent, too lavish.

A waiter in a hotel, George comes across an idea which saves the day for Ken Murray. Ken's a producer who knows his show is going to flop the opening night due to the fact that the Milk Fund is putting on a huge charity ball that night. The handsome waiter suggests that he pose as an Oklahoma oil man who is so struck with Star Alice Faye's charms that he buys the whole house out for a week. As a publicity stunt it's good business, but what it does for Ken's pocketbook is something else again. There's a good supply of gags and guffaws, but not even mild suspense to see you through to the finish. Directed by Irving Cummings. —Universal.

★★★ Rosalie

"Rosalie," with all its bright Cole Porter tunes and its lavish tinsel and cellophane settings, can't hide the fact that it's an old-fashioned screen musical. It's a show which dazzles you with its opulence and Nelson Eddy Fans will love it.

"Rosalie" is big—there are more people in some of its scenes than there will be in some of the theatres which house it—but it has real warmth. Nelson Eddy, its hero, rushes convincingly enough through the Navy team in his role of West Point halfback, but there is no conviction at all in his love songs. Eleanor Powell, a Vassar girl as well as the Princess of Romanza, makes up with her dancing what she lacks in histrionics. Hollywood's lineup of Vassar girls looks as though the college had scouts in a couple of New York night clubs. Ray Bolger, brought from Broadway because he is one of the country's finest dancers, isn't allowed, for some mysterious reason, to dance. However, he makes his presence worth while with his amusing comedy. Frank Morgan and Edna May Oliver also furnish much aid in the comedy department, and Ilona Massey, a newcomer, adds beauty and a lovely voice. Directed by W. S. Van Dyke.—M-G-M.

GLADYS GETS THERE!

I DON'T want to be a meanie," declared Gladys Swarthout in no uncertain terms, "simply because the role is not natural to me. But," she continued, with a look of great determination in her brown eyes, "if standing up for my rights makes me one; well then, I'm it!"

The above declaration came apropos of the tomato-throwing sequence in "Romance in the Dark," her latest picture. Besides the vegetable—or is a tomato a fruit?—smacking the lovely Gladys full on the cheek, the gag smacked more of the custard pie movie era than anything that's been seen around these picture parts lately. Some who witnessed the routine on the set said it was all done in the spirit of good, clean fun; while others claimed it was in the worst possible taste. Be that as it may, the script called for the scene, and so, it was made.

"I was afraid to refuse to do it," opined Miss Swarthout, "for fear someone would say that I was temperamental. I knew that it wasn't right and figured that the surest way to convince the others was to make the scene and let them see it on the screen. Then they'd cut it out. And that is exactly what happened.

"One thing I'd like cleared up though, and that is that my husband did the tomato-throwing. That's the way it was arranged. Since that scene, (Continued on page 119)

In this New Cream the "Skin-Vitamin" the substance which helps to make Skin Beautiful

What makes one woman's skin so smooth—vital looking? Another's dull and dry, even rough?

Mrs. Ogden Goelet

Blonde, petite, with a delicate fair skin. "Pond's Cold Cream with the 'skin-vitamin' has done wonders for my skin. Now it's never rough or dry—seems to keep smoother and fresher looking always."

TODAY, we know of one important factor in skin beauty. We have learned that a certain vitamin aids in keeping skin beautiful. The important "skin-vitamin" about which we are learning more and more every day!

Aids skin more directly

Over four years ago, doctors found that this vitamin, when applied right on the skin, helps it more directly! In cases of wounds and burns, it actually healed skin quicker and better!

Pond's found a way to put this "skin-vitamin" into Pond's Cold Cream. They tested it—during more than three years! In animal tests, skin that had been rough and dry because of "skin-vitamin" deficiency in the diet became smooth and supple again when Pond's Cold Cream containing "skin-vitamin" was applied daily. And this improvement took place in only 3 weeks!

Women report benefits

Today, women who are using Pond's Cream—the new Pond's Cold Cream with "skin-vitamin" in it—say that it does make skin smoother; that it makes texture finer; that it gives a livelier, more glowing look!

Use this new cream just as before—for your nightly cleansing, for the morning freshening-up, and during the day before make-up. Leave some on overnight and whenever you have a chance. Pat it in especially where there are little rough places or where your skin seems dull, lifeless. In a few weeks, see if your skin is not smoother, brighter looking!

Same jars, same labels, same price

A DREAM Walking

FOOLISH words of a popular song. But there's truth in them. In his heart, every man idealizes the woman he loves. He likes to think of her as sweetly wholesome, fragrant, clean the way flowers are clean.

Much of the glamour that surrounds the loved woman in her man's eyes, springs from the complete freshness and utter exquisiteness of her person. Keep yourself wholesomely, sweetly clean!

Your hair, and skin, your teeth—of course you care for them faithfully. But are you attending to that more intimate phase of cleanliness, that of "Feminine Hygiene"? Truly nice women practice Feminine Hygiene regularly, as a habit of personal grooming. Do you? It will help to give you that poise, that sureness of yourself, that is a part of charm.

The practice of intimate Feminine Hygiene is so simple and so easy. As an effective cleansing douche we recommend "Lysol" in the proper dilution with water. "Lysol" cleanses and deodorizes gently but thoroughly.

You must surely read these six reasons why "Lysol" is recommended for your intimate hygiene—to give you assurance of intimate cleanliness.

1—Non-Caustic . . . "Lysol", in the proper dilution, is gentle. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.

2—Effectiveness . . . "Lysol" is a powerful germicide, active under practical conditions . . . effective in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.).

3—Penetration . . . "Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.

4—Economy . . . "Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs only about one cent an application in the proper dilution for Feminine Hygiene.

5—Odor . . . The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears after use.

6—Stability . . . "Lysol" keeps its full strength no matter how long it is kept uncorked.

Feverish? Grippy?
SEE DOCTOR AT ONCE

WARNING! DON'T NEGLECT A COLD!
Cold germs may go UP into the sinuses or DOWN into the bronchials and lungs and lead to a serious illness. If feverish or grippy, see doctor at once!

FOR "RAW" THROAT USE THIS "FIRST AID"

Doctors warn that colds can lead to serious illness—to ear and sinus infection, and even pneumonia. So don't take a chance. Treat the symptoms of a coming cold effectively and without delay! If you feel feverish or grippy see your doctor at once!

TAKE THIS SIMPLE PRECAUTION

For the most effective "first aid," kill the cold germs that cause raw, dry throat. At the first sign of a raw throat cold, gargle with Zonite. Zonite does 3 jobs for you: (1) Cleanses mucous membranes. (2) Increases normal flow of curative, health-restoring body fluids. (3) Kills cold germs present in the throat as soon as it comes in actual contact with them.

In a test to find out the germ-killing powers of the nine most popular, non-poisonous antiseptics on the market, Zonite proved to be actually 9.3 times more active (by standard laboratory tests) than the next best antiseptic compared! This means economy because you use Zonite diluted! Zonite goes farther—saves you money.

Use 1 teaspoon of Zonite to one-half glass of water. Gargle every 2 hours. Zonite tastes like the medicine it really is. Soon your throat feels better.

DON'T DELAY— BE PREPARED

Get Zonite at your druggist now. And at the first sign of rawness in your throat, start gargling at once. But remember: If you are feverish, consult your doctor! Don't risk a serious illness.

ZONITE IS 9.3 TIMES MORE ACTIVE THAN ANY OTHER POPULAR non-poisonous ANTISEPTIC by standard laboratory tests

A studio call sheet, the list of characters and objects needed for the day's shooting schedule, is sometimes prosaic, sometimes amazing. We like the one we found on the set of Columbia's "The Night Before." Here's the list:

9 Santa Clauses
1 Billygoat with beard and appetite for tin cans
1 New York policeman (must have flat feet)
2 African lions that roar easily
1 pack bubble chewing gum for Lionel Stander
1 Ostrich egg (must be fresh)
2 Talking parrots (must not curse)

Things must be very happy indeed at the home of the Richard Powells, of this city. The other night, for instance, at the "Hollywood Hotel" preview, the studio had a microphone set up in the lobby to allow the stars to tell the public what a wonderful picture they knew it was going to be. When Joan Blondell's turn came, she stepped up to the mike and said: "If Dick's in it, I know it's good."

One of the highlights of "Man-Proof" is Myrna Loy's dignified drunk scene. Miss L., who has lost Walter Pidgeon to Rosalind Russell, plays second fiddle at the wedding in the role of bridesmaid. When the reception gets under way so does Myrna, and she winds up going to Miss Russell's room to congratulate her. Polite with champagne, she says, "You deserve him, dear. You're a very pretty girl." Then, as she weaves out of the room, she adds, "And so am I!"

In "Jezebel," Bette Davis, playing a southern belle of the 90's, wears the customary hoop skirts in most of her scenes. We saw her on the set the other day, and talked to her between scenes. Know what she was wearing under them hoops? Slacks!

"100 Men and a Girl" may be a smash hit in America, but in Austria it's much more than that. Because the government considers it a work of art, all picture exhibitors who play it are given a substantial reduction in taxes!

■ ■ ■

The rumors that Garbo's real romance is director Willie Wyler still float around town, and Wyler is the most surprised guy in Hollywood, because he's never met his alleged lady love. It all started as a gag, when a columnist asked Wyler if he had any new romances. "I've been seeing a lot of Garbo lately," said Mr. W. The columnist took his word for it, and you know the rest. That's Hollywood!

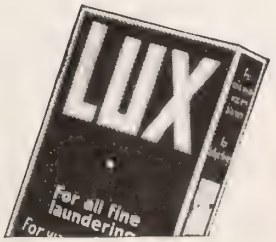
Saving pennies is Dorothy Lamour's pet hobby—that's just one reason she likes Lux

SAVING PENNIES has always been one of this young star's pet hobbies. But once it was a grim necessity.

"I couldn't always afford lots of stockings and undies," she says, "so I took the best possible care of them. I washed them in Lux every night."

Of course, pennies don't worry her now, but she still insists on having her washables cared for with Lux. "I get so fond of my things, I can't bear to see them wear out," she explains.

Every girl can share Miss Lamour's simple Lux secret. Lux has no harmful alkali to fade colors. And with Lux there's no cake-soap rubbing to injure fibers. Safe in water, safe in Lux!



AT PARAMOUNT STUDIOS, Lux is specified for washing everything safe in water alone. "It saves on cleaning, cuts down replacement costs," says Frank Richardson, wardrobe director.

Off the set, Miss Lamour adores soft sweaters, freshly Luxed. Don't miss seeing her in Paramount's "Her Jungle Love."

"Dottie" is also heard on a nationwide radio program each week. In her leisure (?) time this Paramount star likes to relax—in Luxables.

"Lux has always saved me a lot on stockings," says Miss Lamour. "I hardly ever get runs!" Lux saves the elasticity of silk. Then it can stand sudden strains better—isn't so apt to run.

Patricia Hewlett—4 months old

She looks inquiringly at the world, and the world looks back the same way. For Patricia is one of the babies in Westfield, N. J., whose pictures and health records are part of a recent study of infant nutrition. Patricia has been having Clapp's Baby Cereal for 4 weeks; she'll soon get Clapp's Strained Vegetables.

now here's Patricia at 7 months

Laughing out loud to see dessert coming—for now Patricia gets Clapp's Strained Fruits, too. Like all Clapp's Strained Foods, these fruits have the texture doctors advise—smooth, finely strained, but not too liquid. Patricia has gained 2 pounds, 5 ounces in 2 months; she can creep, and sit up like a little major.

Patricia's walking at 10 months

Plentiful vitamins and minerals in her pressure-cooked Clapp's Foods are what make Patricia strong as well as chubby. She's 30 inches tall, weighs 18 pounds, 12 ounces. Like every Clapp-fed baby in the test, Patricia has made steady, uninterrupted progress. And she likes her vegetables. Clapp's flavors are better—just taste and see!

Here's what helped her grow...

"My SKIN now invites a close-up"

"—how well I recall the days and long evenings when I felt tired-out and looked it."

A SKIN that glows naturally bespeaks radiant health beneath . . . it is alive . . . stays fresh! So, be good to your skin from within and it will be good to you.

The reason for this is quite simple . . . skin tissues must have an abundance of red-blood-cells to aid in making the skin glow . . . to bring color to your cheeks . . . to build resistance to germ attacks.

It is so easy for these precious red-blood-cells to lose their vitality. Worry, overwork and undue strain take their toll. Sickness literally burns them up. Improper diet retards the development of new cells. Even a common cold kills them in great numbers.

Science, through S.S.S. Tonic, brings to you the means to regain this blood strength within a short space of time . . . the action of S.S.S. is cumulative and lasting.

Moreover, S.S.S. Tonic whets the appetite. Foods taste better . . . natural digestive juices are stimulated and finally the very food you eat is of more value. A very important step back to health.

You, too, will want to take S.S.S. Tonic to regain and to maintain your red-blood-cells . . . to restore lost weight . . . to regain energy . . . to strengthen nerves . . . and to give to your skin that natural health glow.

Take the S.S.S. Tonic treatment and shortly you should be delighted with the way you feel . . . and have your friends compliment you on the way you look.

S.S.S. Tonic is especially designed to build sturdy health by restoring deficient red-blood-cells and it is time-tried and scientifically proven.

GETTING A GLIMPSE OF GARY

found extra pickings too lean to live on. "Can I help you, Mr. Cooper?" he asked Gary one day, as the actor was leaving his dressing room for the set.

Cooper eyed him. "Well, I don't know. Maybe. Come on out."

Cracker proved himself an asset. It wasn't so much that he helped Cooper to dress, ran errands, anticipated his needs. It was his eager willingness to please, the hundred ways in which he made himself useful without being asked, not to Cooper alone but to everyone on the set. Above all, he was a nice person to have around, with a drollery that brought an answering light to Cooper's eye.

Cooper's an outstanding example of the fallacy of the statement that, to get anywhere in Hollywood, you must play politics. He doesn't know how. There is no guile in him. He remains astonished by his own success, and believes it to be the literal truth that "people pushed me into the movies when I was broke, and kept pushing me right along till they'd made a star out of me. I had little to do with it." He has never had a studio squabble over billing, he has never walked out because of story or director trouble. He doesn't read notices, he hopes "it will be a pretty good picture," and that's as far as he'll go. He values his own talents too modestly to harbor a thought of professional jealousy.

"He worried more over my part in 'Souls at Sea' than over his own," says George Raft, whose usually fluent tongue breaks down when he tries to express his admiration for Cooper. "Look, how'll I say it? You meet a lot of swell people in this business. Well, Coop's the swellest. See that?" He pointed to where Cooper's name was scribbled on a rafter of the dressing-room that had once belonged to him, and was now Raft's. "I'm goin' to have it burned in. That way I can always get a kick out of lookin' at it."

A staunch friendship grew up between the two during the making of "Souls at Sea." Backgrounds totally different proved no barrier. Each found in the other an absence of sham and pose, a basic reality, strong enough to build friendship on. The Cooper home was burglarized one night. A few days later Raft was visiting Cooper on the "Marco Polo" set.

"Did they take much?" he asked.

"So-so. Nothing we cared a lot about. Except that tie-clip you gave me, George. I miss that. It used to hold the tie so well."

"I'll get you another." They both knew Coop could buy himself a dozen clips that would hold his tie equally well. But the chances are, Raft has rarely felt a deeper satisfaction than he got from the knowledge that it was his tie-clip Cooper wanted to use.

Raft and Henry Hathaway, the director, were seated at lunch one day when Cooper joined him. The news that there was to be a baby in the family had broken that morning. "So you're going to be a papa," Raft greeted him. But let him tell it.

"He put his hand up, the way he does, all over his face and down. Then he said, 'Don't believe all you see in the papers.'

"He was shy, tellin' us about the baby. Can you imagine? I said, 'We want to give him the first present, Hathaway and I.'

"Then he looks up and grins. 'Suppose it's not a him,' he says, and that's how he lets us know it's true."

His reactions to the baby's birth were those of any prospective father. He paced the hospital corridor, he jumped at every sound, he cast imploring glances at nurses and doctors; when a door opened, he stopped white-faced in his tracks; when they shook their heads, "Not yet," he resumed his pacing; when a smiling nurse finally emerged with the news, "It's a girl and everything's fine," he collapsed into a chair and sat there shaking.

NOW that the tension is over, he's reverted to type, regained control of his emotions. He doesn't tell you how much the baby weighs, how pretty she is, whom she looks like. But he can't control the smile in his eyes when she's mentioned.

His next picture, now that "Marco Polo"

Ginger Rogers doesn't believe in idleness. She knits between scenes of "Having Wonderful Time," and chats with Lela, her mother, and Cousin Phyllis Fraser.

Meet Penny Singleton. You used to know her as Dorothy McNulty, but after "Swing Your Lady," she'll be slated for bigger and better things, and so she changed her name!

is finished, is a comedy with Claudette Colbert, called "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife" and directed by Lubitsch. His emergence as a comedian is erroneously dated from "Mr. Deeds." It was Lubitsch who uncovered his gift for humor in "Design for Living," and he takes his cigar from his mouth to smile over the memory.

"Zey all sought I am crazy. Articles are written about zis terrible miscasting. 'Why do you do it?' zey yell at me. I tell you why. Before, I have not seen Cooper in any part where he is exactly a comedian, but I have noticed in many straight parts zat once in a while zere comes a comedy flash—in sometimes a look, in sometimes a funny gesture, and I know zat in Cooper zere hides a comedian. I am positive. I say to him: 'Gahry, it is a new kind of part, but a cinch for you if you only want to be yourself.' Gahry jumps right away, he doesn't hesitate. 'O.K.,' he said.

"Well, Gahry was himself. It was not zat he acquired a comedy technique, no. He played wis a humor which came from wiz*zin*. His comedy is humor—not to make faces and srow custard pies, but to put his own feeling into ze part.

"I will say, here is ze great sing about Cooper as well in life as in work—zere is nossing of ze obvious and ze cheap side of an actor in him, nossing of ze showoff. He is ze greatest contrast to what you might call a ham. Zere is a certain heart-simplicity, which is in himself and which comes out on ze screen. He is an actor by instinct, and instinct is always stronger zan technique. Technique you may admire, but you don't love it. And zey all love Gahry, hein?"

Cooper goes out of his way to avoid fanfare. He shuns gatherings where cameras are likely to pop. With rare exceptions. One of them occurred when a script clerk, who had worked on several of his pictures, died. Her husband worked on the Paramount lot, too, in the transportation department. On the day of her burial Cooper called Henry Hathaway.

"Are you going to the funeral? All right, I'll see you there."

"Don't you want me to call for you?" Hathaway asked, knowing his friend's aversion to public appearances and thinking to lend him moral support.

"No. I'll see you there."

It wasn't till the services were ended that Hathaway understood. Five of those who carried the girl to her long rest were drivers in the Paramount transportation department. The sixth was Gary Cooper.

WHOM WILL TYRONE POWER MARRY?

that Tyrone's Moon square Saturn suggests marriage to a girl older than himself. At the risk of giving away trade secrets, we here divulge that Sonja, as well as Janet, saw the light of day before the Great Moment had uttered his first cry.

But it takes more than liking the way a girl dresses her hair to have a man, especially of Tyrone's stamp, stand in the aisle waiting for someone in a white veil to come and breathe "I will." Specifically, it takes some coöperation on the part of the planet Mars, which lends the needed fire.

This is where little Sonja loses out. Her Mars is in Pisces, square to Saturn, and it's Saturn that sits squarely on Tyrone's Venus. This is an attraction of sorts, and sometimes a pretty violent one, but it doesn't usually last. Tyrone is a free soul, independent as all get-out, especially where his love life is concerned. If he ever felt for one minute that a girl thought him securely tied up, he would automatically break for the open country.

Sonja's Saturn on his Venus very likely made him feel confined, obligated, if you like. This probably wasn't Sonja's fault. She values independence as much as he does, maybe more. But with her Venus in Taurus, she'd just naturally expect the man who loved her to feel the way she did—sewed up. Venus in Gemini simply doesn't ever feel that way; and the pressure of Sonja's Saturn on Tyrone's Venus, plus the square of Mars, caused the break.

JANET GAYNOR, however, is something else again! Her Libra nature is excellently suited to understand Tyrone's attitude toward love. She has Venus in Scorpio, opposed to her Moon in Taurus, giving her just the kind of glamor to turn Tyrone's head. And, in addition to this, there is between their horoscopes that dynamic signature of the attraction fatale, her Mars on his Moon!

This is precisely the condition between two horoscopes that causes a romantic young man like Tyrone Power to kick over the traces and forswear everything in the past, for the sake of "The woman I love." When a romantic meets up with this condition, the rest of womankind pales into insignificance. If he's married, he may even get a divorce, so as never to lose the glamorous creature who has captivated him. It is the Tristram and Isolde, Abelard and Eloise, Romeo and Juliet combination. The sad thing is that it doesn't line up to the preliminary fireworks. It burns out. It dies. It causes heartbreak, and it generally leaves the man feeling that now he has seen life, now he knows the truth about women, now he is a cynic, and he is never going to love anyone again.

This isn't Janet's fault. There's nothing flighty about her horoscope. She isn't the kind of girl to lead a man on (least of all a man young enough to be her kid brother) and then break his heart just for the fun of it.

Tyrone thinks she means something that she doesn't mean. He misunderstands. She likes him, she's attracted to him (who isn't?) but she isn't going to marry him. And if Tyrone broke Sonja's heart, he may learn before very long how it felt.

OF course, there's always the chance that the glamor of Mars on the Moon will last long enough to lead the victims to the altar. But there isn't enough between Janet's horoscope and Tyrone's to make an enduring marriage. Tyrone has obstacles to overcome (his contract says he can't marry) and while he's overcoming those obstacles, the fires are going to cool, considerably.

The point of the whole matter, however, is that it doesn't look as if Tyrone is going to marry at all for awhile. With Uranus in his Sun this year, he has glamor aplenty. It would be criminal for him to concentrate it all on one girl, even such a worthy one as Sonja or Janet. He might do anything under this condition, even marry, because Uranus on the Sun is about as impulsive a condition as can exist in his already impulsive and romantic horoscope. Jupiter also inclines him to marriage in this, his twenty-fourth year.

But we are still inclined to doubt that he'll marry very soon. He might marry and get a swift divorce. We expect him to be in the market for some time to come, a sadder and a wiser young man, with the additional heart-appeal of having learned what it is like to suffer.

LET'S TALK ABOUT MIRIAM

begged for the part," announced Selznick. "The only one who hasn't approached me is Miss Hopkins, and actually the public has given her more votes than anybody else."

Then he bowed charmingly. And that was that.

"I never heard from him," admitted Miss Hopkins. "But it was dramatic, the way he walked in, wasn't it?"

"Dramatic things seem to happen to you," I said. "What about the time they say you were broke and borrowed money from Otto Kahn, or isn't that true?"

"You bet it's true," laughed Miriam. "But no one knows the whole story."

So she told it to me.

It was in the days when Miriam was a young Broadway actress whose engagements were rare and short. She had opened in a show called "The Garden Of Eden." It had been a hit in London because of a part played by Tallulah Bankhead, a part in which Miss Bankhead profitably shocked the audience by undressing on the stage. Miriam played that part here, but when it came to the undressing, friends told her mother not to mind because "Miriam looks like a schoolgirl going to bed."

"Maybe that was why the show closed," grimly adds Miriam now. "Anyway it left me broke. And I had a theory . . . if you're broke don't borrow money from your friends. Don't tell your troubles to the switchboard girl, just go and borrow from a regular banker. So I did."

"But how?" I asked.

"Otto Kahn had backed 'An American Tragedy,' in which I played Sandra. I asked a columnist friend for his telephone number and from the newspaper office we called him. Mr. Kahn didn't remember me until I reminded him of Sandra. Then he made an appointment.

"I remember it was a sweltering hot day. The waiting room outside his office was air cooled. It was the first time I ever sat in an air cooled room and I was very impressed. On the way down I had rehearsed what I intended saying. I planned to ask for five thousand dollars and be very nonchalant about it. I wanted to pay most of my debts. I wanted to have the feeling of owing everything just one place. With the rest of the money I wanted to buy a roadster and take a vacation.

"All this I was going to say to Mr. Kahn, but as I sat waiting I grew petrified. Several very elegant looking striped-trousered bankers sat waiting too, and as the minutes passed I couldn't remember one word of my speech. I finally was ushered into his office. It was a great long room and I seemed to walk miles before I reached his desk. By that time I could only blurt out one sentence. It was, 'I've come for cash!'

"He was very businesslike about it. He made a list of my debts. He didn't approve of the owing-one-place method. He believed in scattering your payments. I had no security to offer. But I promised to pay him back out of future salaries. So he gave me a check for twelve hundred-and-fifty dollars. I raced straight back to the newspaper office to show this to my friends who wanted to frame it!"

Then this happened, this, so typical of Miriam. She had paid Otto Kahn four hundred-and-fifty dollars and had eight hundred more to go when she was offered a stock engagement at five hundred dollars a week . . . or the chance to marry Austin Parker and live in a small French village on next to nothing.

"I wrote Otto Kahn a note and said I had chosen Austin because 'a girl could always get a job in stock, but it was not so easy to get a husband!'

"Mr. Kahn must have liked the note because, when he came to France, he invited us to dinner. I finally paid the debt, and he wrote me that of all the people to whom he loaned money, the writer, Frank Harris, and I, were the only people who paid him back. Of course I was very proud of that note and kept it."

I stared at her then, stared at her sitting there before me, looking more like the kid who impulsively rushed to Otto Kahn than a star who owns one of the few New York houses boasting a garden.

SHE wore a beaver trimmed cloth coat, and a dark blue dress with a blue and green plaid scarf wound schoolgirl-like around her throat. And on her shoulder-length hair was perched, no fifty-dollar French creation, but her five-and-half-year-old son's blue beret! This, mind you, in a popular New York restaurant during a crowded luncheon hour. And I liked her

Between scenes of "A Slight Case of Murder," Edward G. Robinson tickles the ivories, much to the amusement of Harry Seymour.

Nope, it's not romance, just a family affair. Doug Fairbanks Jr., is explaining what goes on on the "Having Wonderful Time" set to his cousin, Letitia.

for it, this naturalness . . . no crayoned eyebrows here (they're light, like her hair) and no false eyelashes, just a rosy face that has a certain squareness about it.

"I haven't much resistance. I've had a bad cold for weeks." And her eyes looked watery. I liked her for that too, for being a movie star with a cold and eating in a public place.

And I reminded her of a part she once played, the role of a swanky heiress with a bad cold, a girl who sneezed constantly.

She laughed. "I remember. It was 'The Richest Girl in the World.' We had a lot of fun making that. It only took a month, and every afternoon we'd knock off at four to play tennis. And everyone liked the picture."

She sighed. She was very tired. She had stepped off a California-New York plane to walk directly into rehearsal for "Wine of Choice," a new Theatre Guild play with Leslie Banks and Donald Cook. And she had this cold.

"My little boy caught it from me in California. You know how children climb all over you. I feel so sorry for him.

She slurs her words together. She speaks so quickly that she choked on a piece of steak, and I found myself slapping her back.

She says a lot of things, says them fast.

About temperament. "If you start acting temperamental it's an awful nuisance to keep it up."

About players. "Spencer Tracy is the screen's best. And I think George Raft is a good actor. But take my word, Jack Oakie could and should be doing serious roles. I once saw him rehearse a scene with two tears running down his cheeks, which shows he really feels."

About women. She says she dislikes those who pose coyly under picture hats and change their personalities when a man enters the room.

And then, just as fast as she spoke, so fast did she suddenly rise with a "Let's get out of here before they say I'm always late to rehearsals."

Without putting on the beret she ran hurriedly across the street to the theatre, but not before several girls, matinee-bound saw her, and even with the red nose, the watery eyes and the cold, they smiled indulgently, exclaiming, "Isn't she cute!"

She is.

WHEN YOU EAT A LOT YET STAY SKINNY WEAK, SICKLY LOOK OUT FOR MAL-NOURISHMENT

Often Your System Is Starving for Iron, Iodine and Vitamins Vitally Needed to get the Good Out of Food!

Thousands Report New Mineral-Vitamin Concentrate From the Sea—Adds Extra Pounds of "Stay-There" Flesh, New Strength and Energy the First Week!

Malnourishment (an insufficient supply of minerals and vitamins) often explains why folks stay thin, ailing, worn out, with weakened resistance. Doctors know appetite satisfying foods are deceiving because frequently they lack vital minerals and essential vitamins needed for body building. As a result, you do not get the good out of the food you eat and your system lacks in strength, energy and weight.

Many thousands of pale, sickly, ailing folks have found glorious relief with Kelpamalt. This amazing iron, iodine and vitamin concentrate is rich in vital elements necessary for the body's chemical processes. It contains assimilable iron, copper, phosphorous and calcium vitally needed for blood and tissue building. Most important is Kelpamalt's natural iodine—not to be confused with ordinary liquid, chemical iodine. Iodine, scientists say, is found in the blood, liver and glands. It is vitally important to their normal functioning. A recent report states that 60 million people in the United States are not getting enough iodine in their daily food. Experts recommend the addition of two plates of oysters each week for their iodine, yet Kelpamalt is far richer in iodine than oysters. In addition to these precious minerals, Kelpamalt contributes to the resistance building Vitamin A, the growth and body building Vitamin G, the blood building Vitamin C, and the bone building Vitamin D. It is only when there is an adequate supply of vitamins plus minerals that you can get the good out of your food.

"Aw, heck," said Wayne, tipping back in his chair, "do I have to stay here and listen to this?"

"You do. We wouldn't dream of talking about you behind your back, so you may as well be a brave little man and face it."

Wayne fortified himself, by ordering cokes all around. Then he lit a cigarette and obscured himself behind a smoke-screen, or tried to, but Priscilla's blue eyes penetrated the veil while she said, "It's the way he looks at a girl, haven't you noticed? He practises on me all day."

"You know better, Priscilla. You know that—"

"He practises on me all day," continued Priscilla firmly, ignoring him.

"Now, you take Wayne at lunch time. He never sits next to a girl, he always sits opposite her so that he can get that look in, with its devastating effect. And it devastates. He watches everything a girl does, too, see, look, like he's doing now! He just sits with that rapt, intent look and takes in every little gesture, every motion, looking as though he just can't believe it, it's all so wonderful and new and almost divine. That's the real reason for his being so attractive to girls, you see. He makes each and every girl believe that she is the one and only girl ever born onto this earth, or ever likely to be born."

"You know very well, Priscilla—"

THEN there's his laugh. He has a sort of shining laugh that seems to come bouncing right out of his heart. He makes a girl laugh, too, and feel that everything is pretty much all right with the world. He's the life of the party type, only in the sense that he's so full of life, so gay.

"He's quiet, though, with it all. He's not the bombastic show-off type. And he can talk your heart right out of you. He makes you believe that he's right and you are wrong no matter what the argument may be. And somehow, you like it. He doesn't use only his enormous physical strength, he uses the old beano as well. And he sings and plays to you," continued Priscilla, demurely, ignoring the Morris moans. "It's marvellous.

"Now I have sung on the radio for quite some time. But whenever I start a song Wayne finishes it for me and carries on from there. He can sing in several different keys, too, almost at the same time. And then he can top any wisecrack I can think of making. And I earned my living for quite some time making wisecracks on the air. But every time I pull one, he pulls a better one. You've got to respect a man with a brain like that, you know.

"And then, besides all this," said Priscilla, lowering her voice a degree, "he's considerate. He's thoughtful and tender and he's very respectful. He never says anything to a girl that he couldn't say in front of her mother or in front of her little sister, aged eight. There is something old-fashioned about Wayne in his way with girls. And he's interesting, and very attractive, because he is, superficially, so modern. He knows all the answers. It's sort of a putting-a-girl-on-a-pedestal attitude which is, of course, completely fatal to us all."

"Now, Priscilla, where do you get that 'us all,' you know very well that——"

But Priscilla was saved. She was called to the set and she left, saying, "I've fixed everything! He'll fix me for this after you leave. You'd better stay around and protect me or there'll really be headlines!"

And then Wayne came out from behind his smoke screen and said, "She's the swellest girl I've ever known, isn't she?" To which purely rhetorical question I said, "Do you really think so?" Wayne grinned and nodded his head and then said, "But do we have to talk about romance and all that? I know that people like to read about romance, but there's been so much of the stuff written about me it's getting kind of silly, and it's very embarrassing. Besides, it's bad publicity for me.

"I'd rather have it written that I appear at benefits and things. I'd rather talk for publication about my favorite color, which is red, and my favorite flowers, which are all kinds except orchids and about how I collect suitcase stickers and drive a small car and about my pets, a police dog and a horse and about how I like everything to eat except vegetables, especially chocolate fudge sundaes, with nuts."

"Why is publicity about your romances bad for you?"

"Because I haven't had any, for one thing," said Wayne pleasantly but firmly (but he didn't look towards Priscilla as he said this) "and so it's pretty silly. I read that I've been out with some girl I haven't seen for two months and they give one date a two months' hangover. And it's kind of stupid for both of us. But that isn't the important thing. It's bad for me because the studio reads that I've been seen at this place and that, with this girl and that and they call me to the mat and tell me I'm going too much, keeping late hours and that it's apt to affect my work, that sort of thing. It isn't true. I don't go out often nor stay up late.

BESIDES, I don't have and never have had as many dates with as many different girls as fellows do who are in college or working in banks or gas stations. I've only taken out some six or seven girls in the whole year and a half I've been in pictures. And I know fellows, friends of mine, who take a different girl out two and three times a week. And it's perfectly normal, isn't it, for a fellow who's single and over twenty-one, to ask different girls for dates? It's only because I'm in the spot I'm in that anyone pays any attention to it, finds anything to remark about, figures that it's a romance every time it's a date."

"Then it hasn't been love, it hasn't been romance, with any of these dates?"

"Gosh, no!" laughed Wayne. He said this quite loudly, Priscilla being within loud-speaking earshot. "I don't go around falling in love with every girl I ask to have dinner with me. The girls don't go around falling in love with every guy who asks them out. We've just had a swell lot of fun together, that's all. They're swell girls,

THE NEW 1938 BEAUTY DISCOVERY

A petal-like smoothness from top to toe

WOMEN SAY it's the Number One care the entire body needs—this combination of the Linit Magic Beauty Mask and the Linit Beauty Bath.

This beauty treatment costs almost nothing, yet it is a wonderfully effective way to refresh the whole body and at the same time stimulate and clarify the complexion.

First make the Linit Magic Beauty Mask: *Simply mix three tablespoons of Linit (the same Linit that is used for the bath) and one teaspoon of cold cream with enough milk to make a nice, firm consistency. Apply it generously to the cleansed face and neck and then step into your tub into which a handful or so of Linit has been dissolved.

WHILE the velvety smoothness of the Linit Beauty Bath is caressing your body, the Linit Magic Beauty Mask is gently inducing facial circulation to throw off sluggish waste matter. Relax for twenty minutes, then step out and dry off. Rinse the mask from your face and neck with clear, tepid water and pat thoroughly dry.

How refreshed—how vibrant your whole body will feel! Hours of fatigue seem to vanish in a few minutes.

You will find that the Linit Magic Beauty Mask leaves the face and neck with a petal-like smoothness, a velvety "film" that is an excellent powder base. This helps to heighten the allure of your make-up and keep it fresh-looking for hours longer.

too, the girls I've had dates with. They're the kind of girls I like, regular girls, with laughs up their sleeves, the kind of girls who like to go on the roller-coasters and eat hamburgers and act like human beings.

"I wouldn't go for any of these exotic types, kind of strange and sireny. One thing is sure, you meet as nice girls in pictures as you'd meet in any exclusive suburb, college, country club or deb party anywhere in the world. Girls like Olivia De Havilland and Anita Louise and Cecilia Parker and Priscilla, all of them. Where could you find sweller, nicer girls?" But when he said "Priscilla," his voice dropped an octave and his eyes found her and had that look in them that gave a flash of the Morris tenderness.

"Then you are evidently not susceptible," I said, "for if you were, you would certainly have fallen in love once or twice."

"I'm not susceptible at all.

"I haven't even thought I was in love, until—" he broke off, began again. "There has never been any talk of love between us, the girls I've gone out with and me. Most of us, like Priscilla and me, for instance, are just starting our careers and—"

"You're at least five good jumps ahead of me," called Priscilla, overhearing this last, as she was intended to.

"That's the way it should be, sweetheart," grinned Wayne (but he meant it, you could see).

"And," he went on, "I couldn't fall in love, not really in love, until I had known a girl for quite a long while, and very well. I don't think you can call it love until you know all about a girl, her likes and dislikes, her habits, the way her mind works as well as the way her eyes smile, her character.

"You see, when I marry I want it to be for all of my life. And you can't be as sure as all that unless you've had time and opportunity to be sure, can you?"

Priscilla laughed.

WELL, we've been going out together for over a month," said Wayne, "and working together every day on the set. I guess that's both time and opportunity, woman."

"I know it is," said Priscilla, and the seriousness in her voice, in her eyes, the way they looked at one another, gave the first sure suspicion that this "date" of Wayne's may be "for all my life."

Wayne is, he said, in his nice, frank smiling way, kind of old-fashioned where women are concerned. He doesn't, for instance, believe that girls belong on the golf links. Golf, he says, is a man's game. "When I slice a ball I make comments that I wouldn't want any girl I cared about to hear. I don't believe in taking a girl to the fights. For you know what happens at the fights. Some guy in back of you will yell, 'Kill the so-and-so,' and then, if you have a girl with you, she will say, or think, that you ought to knock the guy down for using such language where she can hear it and you feel like saying, 'Well, you haven't any business to be here at all,' and then there's trouble, one way or another. I don't think girls should sit in on poker games. That's all men's stuff and women should keep out of it, or be kept out of it."

"Then you sort of believe that woman's place is in the home, huh?"

"Yep," Wayne said, "I do. I wouldn't want my wife to work. I certainly wouldn't want to be married to a big star."

"Can you imagine," gurgled Priscilla joyfully, "Wayne being called 'Mister Greta Garbo' or something!"

"No one'll have a chance to imagine it," said Wayne, darkly. "I don't believe marriages like that work out. And if a man is married to a big star and their marriage is going on the rocks because of it, it's up to the woman to give up her career and save her marriage."

"Hear, hear!" said Priscilla.

"Of course," continued Wayne, imperturbably, "if two people, a girl and a boy, just beginning on the screen, their careers comparatively equal, should fall in love and get married, that might be all right. It would then be up to the man, as it is up to the man in any walk of life, to keep ahead of the girl, to be more successful, make more money than she does."

"And if the girl should be the one to get way ahead," I said, "and the marriage should be threatened because of it, it would be up to her to drop out of the ranks, is that it?"

"Yep," said Mister Morris, and his eyes were on Priscilla and was that his heart in his eyes or was it not?

I said, "Look here, I don't want to have to yell 'you hit me, you unspeakable brute' to you, Wayne, but if you two are going to do any Yuma-ing in the near future, I think I ought to know. I don't want to come out in print and say that Priscilla Lane and Wayne Morris are just "another date," only to have the newspapers announce on the self-same day that Wayne Morris and Priscilla Lane have middle-aisled it (credit Winchell).

June Lang was very much among those present at the preview of "Love And Hisses." She was escorted by A. C. Blumenthal, her most frequent companion these days, but Mr. B. preferred not to pose.

"Oh," said Wayne, "it's serious enough. Of course, she hasn't given me a ring yet, I'd like a nice opal."

"We're very serious," agreed Priscilla, flourishing the coke bottle in Wayne's general direction, "although he does get a lot of phone calls, even on the set, and always says they are from an assistant director he knows."

"I've got to get my feet more firmly on the ground than I have them now before I can even talk about marriage," said Wayne. "This being nearly 'a star overnight' is all very exciting and flattering but a star can fall quicker than it can rise, too. I've got to get more money in the bank, a house built."

"He's going to make his first trip to New York very soon, too," said Priscilla, with sweet thoughtfulness. "Of course, he could drop into Cartiers while he is there, if he has time," she added. "I don't believe in big weddings."

"It will, I mean, it would be an elopement," Wayne said, "although a Hollywood wedding minus a photographer or two among the flowers might not be legal."

And then they both stopped kidding because this, obviously, is no kidding matter. And they said that honestly, they don't know yet, they haven't really talked about it much and they haven't set any date. That was all they would say.

But just the same, girls, at any moment, now, you may hear that Wayne Morris has made his last, and permanent date.

Meet the gang! These are the kids you see in all of those hilarious "Our Gang" comedies, though they look subdued here!

pucker our brows and bite our lips and wonder whether we will be able to keep marriage romantic and things like that.

"Johnny and I are not afraid of anything. We're not afraid of losing our careers; we're not afraid of losing love. We have all the confidence in the world that everything's going to be all right for us.

"We won't sacrifice our personal lives to our careers any more than we will sacrifice our personal lives to domesticity. When we are invited to a party we don't refuse to go because we are working and must save ourselves for our work. If we feel like going to the party, we go to the party, without going into a huddle as to the why of it all.

"Our housekeeping is very simple. We have a Filipino houseboy and a maid, and they do everything there is to be done around the house. Johnny plans the meals and orders them because he did it before he was married. I never did, because mother did it for me. I never know what I'm going to eat until I sit down and eat it. I'll admit that there are occasional drawbacks. The other day, Phyllis Fraser (Ginger Rogers' cousin, you know, and one of my very best friends) and Paula Stone and I were having lunch together at the Vendome. I ordered an enormous order of chicken a la king, and ate every bit of it. When I sat down to dinner at home that night I had chicken a la king, an enormous order and ate every bit of it. We're not fussy about small things.

"We run our lives independently, much as we always did. We do our jobs independently. Like today, I'm having an interview with you and Johnny is having a portrait sitting at Paramount. We talk things over, of course. We give each other good advice, we hope. We have our same crowd, Phyllis and Paula and the others. We see quite a lot of Mischa Auer and his wife and their little boy, who live in the same apartment house we do. We don't go in for formal entertaining in our crowd. We just get together and have last-minute impromptu supper parties and play the radio and dance and sometimes we all doll up and go to the Troc. We play tennis and swim and we're all sun-worshippers."

Anne waved to Ginger, sitting across the room. She made a face at Eric Blore who made a face back at her. She managed to drop a checkbook while exchanging greetings with Jack Oakie, who took off the tablecloth and waved it. She retrieved the checkbook, tapped it on her glass, laughed and said, "This is the only difference marriage has made in my life! I now keep a checkbook carefully. Before I was married I always wrote counter checks and never knew whether I had one dollar or one thousand in the account. I know now. I wouldn't make out a counter check to save myself from hunger."

"Do you do the family bookkeeping?"

"No," Anne explained. "You see, it's different with couples who are just domestic, I guess. Then, one or the other takes over the reins of government and attends to all such matters as checking accounts, bills and so on. It's different when both are earning. We divide things, in a way. Johnny pays all the household expenses, rent, servants, food, public utilities, cars. I only pay for my own clothes and what I do for Mother. The rest of my money I save. Which is the way it should be."

Anne, when not yet twenty, had built a substantial trust fund for her mother, had given her two houses. This little girl, born Dawn Evelyn Paris, who didn't have too auspicious a start in life, who was born in New York City, half orphaned when she was an infant in arms, added to the family income by posing for commercial artists when she was fourteen months. At three, did her first bit in a picture; at four played in a picture with Pola Negri. Then her talent beyond question, came to Hollywood and, with her mother, living with rigid economy, struggling constantly for work, conquering that oblivion which so often submerges the child star when she grows up, was able, while still in her teens, to do what many a substantial business man in his forties is only beginning to hope for.

There's stuff in this Shirley child, strong stuff.

of fine brown wool, as is the little coatee worn over her shoulders. An especially attractive masculine feature is seen in the brown checked "waistcoat," with the imitation pockets piped in brown, and brown wool-covered buttons. The neat-looking shirt, collar, tie and cuffs are of off-white pique.

THE schoolgirl's clothes seem to fall into two general classifications, those she wears to class and for sports, and her "date" dresses. For Maureen when she's out of college environs, Hubert created a smart outfit. The slender, fitted skirt with three-inch slits at the side is of mid-blue wool cloque, a very popular fabric this season. The close-fitting jacket is of the same material, faced and backed with panels of dark blue velvet, relieved by pocket trimming of mid-blue. The jacket zips up the front, and the small round collar, the tie, and slide fastener covering are of pale blue pique.

When you've seen all of the costumes Maureen wears in this picture, you'll decide that the life of the Oxford gal isn't so bad, and you'll understand why the Yank fell in love with this young lady.

However, if you're looking for inspiration, you don't have to go to Oxford, for you'll find plenty in other current pictures.

In "Hold 'Em Navy," Mary Carlisle wears sets of a leather calot, belt, gloves and bag, and her favorite is of dubonnet suede, which she wears with a light grey tweed skirt and top coat and a lovely pale blue angora sweater.

Speaking of sweaters, the uniform of the American campus, Lana Turner has no less than twenty-five in her personal wardrobe. One is of blue brushed wool, and buttons in back with seven wooden buttons, carved to simulate the heads of the dwarfs in "Snow White," Walt Disney's latest masterpiece. You're going to see the "Snow White" influence a great deal in fashions this spring, not only in trimmings, but in fabric patterns and even in hat styles!

Rosalind Russell's clothes will give you

Judging from their smiles, Bob Cummings and his pretty wife must have enjoyed their evening at "Wells Fargo."

Joel McCrea and Frances Dee (Mr. and Mrs. to you), attended the "Wells Fargo" preview with Director John Ford. Joel has his most important role to date in this picture, and Frances is the love interest.

In "Love and Hisses" we'll bet the hisses aren't directed at lovely Simone Simon, who demonstrates her ability as a songbird.

plenty of ideas, too. Study carefully her costumes in "Man-Proof." Roz is numbered among the ten best dressed as "the perfect sportswoman—an ideal example of clean-cut American womanhood. She excels everyone in the manner she wears tweeds."

A new angle in hat fashions is being introduced by Joan Blondell. In "The Perfect Specimen," most of her hats were made of the same material as her dresses. Inspired by this clever ensemble idea, Joan is now having all her hats made to match her dresses.

Franciska Gaal, who plays opposite Fredric March in "The Buccaneer," was so entranced by the pirate sashes that Freddie wore in the picture that she has had several of them made up in bright red silk jersey and wears them on plain black dresses. This is a wonderful idea for rejuvenating your basic black dress.

If the stars themselves garner many of their style ideas from pictures, then you certainly can, too.

Pond's Vanishing Cream was always great for smoothing your skin for powder, and overnight, too. Now the use of Pond's "skin-vitamin" Vanishing Cream actually nourishes your skin!

The regular use of this cream will make your skin look richer, fresher, clearer.

Same jars, same labels, same price

Among others who turned out for the big opening racing meet were Walter Connolly and Jack Holt, who are talking over the best bets of the day. It's serious business!

George Brent believes in reading up on all the dope, but we'll bet he didn't remember much of it when the excitement began. "He Did" was the favorite to win, and he did!

AT SANTA ANITA

No racing meet would be complete without Al Jolson and his Ruby Keeler. They're usually the first to arrive and the last to leave. Al's a good loser, too.

Spence Tracy just can't make up his mind. Everybody he knows has given him a different tip and to hear them tell it, he can't lose. Oh, yeah?

As this was snapped, Connie Bennett was a lot more interested in her hot dog than in what horse was running when.

Ronald Reagan and Lana Turner got right into the spirit of things by wearing their riding clothes. No fancy duds for them when it's racing day. All they're interested in is the winnah—but then, who isn't?

MOVIE-STAR BEAUTY FOR YOU

and for this reason I'm in favor of 'em.

Daily brushing, a hundred strokes, upward and out, will assure you a pliable, healthy textured hair, an important requisite or the coiffure won't stay put. That means oil before every shampoo, massage every other day or so, for ten minutes, and that's another reason I'm in favor of 'em. And then, too, I think a change is nice every once in a while, a change for you, a different gal for your beau or husband to look at.

But—a very large-sized but—these new hair-dos are hard where hats are concerned. You'll have to pick hats very carefully. With no softening effect at the back of the neck or alongside the ears, you can't wear a beret or a comfortable pull-on. You can wear toques, high hats, big hats, all the goofy little confections that emphasize the forward movement or the upward movement.

Such hats must be carefully selected, they can't be too cheap, they must be put on with a great deal of care and worn with considerable chic and dash. If, I say if, you can manage all these factors, I'm in favor of the upward movement in hairdressing for you. And there are more "ifs."

If your face is average in shape and size, okay. If it's thin, go in for a slight bang, which will widen the face a little, and don't pile the hair too, too high. If your face is heavy in bone structure, if you have a large jaw and wide mouth, say, you must pass up the high-piled locks and stick to the softening effect of waves over the ears and a medium-length bob or medium-placed knob. If your face is plump, but not heavy in bone structure, experiment, and be careful.

I told you my feelings were divided on the subject. Generally speaking, I'm all for the upward trend, but women are so apt to fall for anything new and never give a thought as to suitability, I felt duty-bound to express all these cautions.

Tsk, how that Marshall woman does digress! I'm supposed to be a-telling you how you can have a spot of movie star beauty for your very own, and I must get on, I must. How about your eyes, now? I've got more to say this month about eyes than the good old one-two-three about eye make-up.

Mickey Rooney and Betty Jaynes, two of Hollywood's younger stars, at a premiere.

I'VE picked Marjorie Weaver to illustrate one very important point—eye exercise. Marjorie, as you know if you saw her hit-making appearance in "Second Honeymoon," has the prettiest pair of peepers we've seen in many a day. However, when she first began working under the wicked studio lights, she couldn't help blinking and squinting, her eyes watered miserably, and she was inclined to stare. The studio dramatic coach made her do a simple exercise, every day for ten minutes: look to the left, look up, look to the right, look down. Do it quickly, but make each direction in which your eyes glance absolutely definite.

You don't have to suffer the glare of the Kliegs, but you do many things which are almost as hard on the eyes: long hours of reading, fine sewing, copying ill-written material on the typewriter, perhaps, driving a car (and is night driving hard on the eyes!), such things, if done under unfavorable conditions, cause eyes to lose their natural sparkle, get bloodshot, and also bring that vertical line on the forehead which makes you look old before your time.

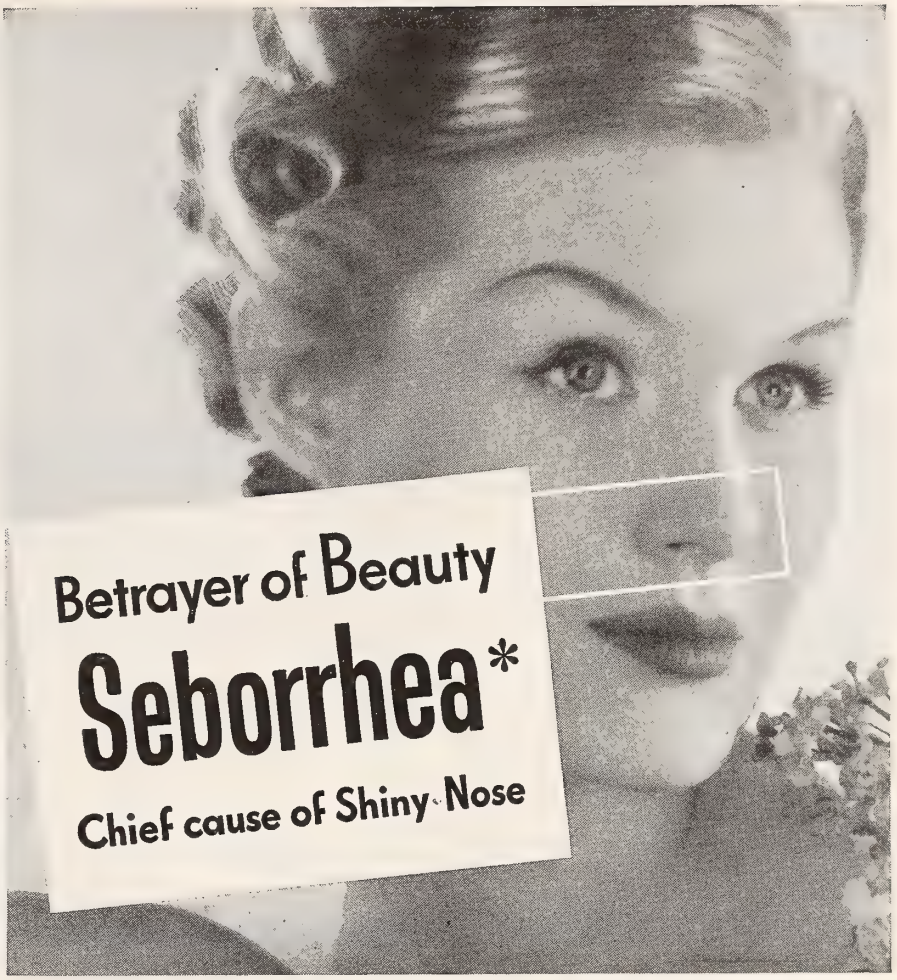
The exercise I've borrowed from Marjorie's coach is good. Covering the eyes with a piece of black velvet and lying down for a few minutes is good. Eye baths of weak boric acid solution are good. Covering the eyes with pads of cotton soaked in ice cold witch hazel is just as good as "expensible" herbal eye-packs you see advertised, though the eye-packs do smell nicer. It's a sad thing, by the way, that the most beautiful eyes often have the poorest sight.

I don't know whether optical science could back this up with any statistics, but I've often known girls with lovely soft brown eyes and big blue orbs, not to be able to read the fine print, while unglamorous green and nondescript hazel eyes kept eagle-like seeing ability until old age. What am I leading up to now, you ask? Eyeglasses, my darlings. If you have the least suspicion that your sight isn't of the best, get some glasses for resting, reading, going to the movies or whatever the doctor orders. Don't read on a moving vehicle. That's tough on you commuters, who catch up with your literature on the 8:15, but it's not as tough as having continual headaches later on. Have at least one good 75 or 100 watt bulb in the house for reading and sewing at night, and have the light coming over your left shoulder.

So much for sensible beauty hints, now for sumpin' more frivolous. If your eyes are naturally lovely, you don't need any help, but if they're just so-so, or on the uninteresting side, practice patience and ingenuity can give them some touch of movie star allure.

Sit down before a brightly lighted mirror some evening-at-home, and experiment. Have a jar of oily cream, like a good tissue cream, or a tube of vaseline. A soft eye-pencil, the one made by the famous gent who makes most of the beauty-aids used by the movie stars is best. Brown is the best shade. Have several shades of mascara and eye shadow, purchase the small sizes in the five and dime store.

It still goes on, the perennial romance between George Raft and Virginia Pine. A handsome couple they make, too!



Make up the rest of your pan as you usually do.

Now, begin drawing lines around your eyes. Have you deep eyelids—that is, is there a lot of space between lash and eyebrow to work on? Try the "Garbo lining," drawing a thin line deep into the lid, where it goes back into the eye socket. Yuh can only do this if your lids are very deep. Are your eyes small? Try some eyeshadow on the outer half of the lid and blend it on way out toward the temple. Help this effect by lengthening your brows with pencil. Have you that type of lash which doesn't seem to take mascara at all, rather thick and rather short and straight? Try this: apply cream or vaseline, then powder right over it, then put on the mascara. I ain't in favor of false eyelashes offscreen, but you can even try those if you want to. Remember that everything put on the eyelids must be blended, the lines blurred a bit, not to look freakish.

Well, now, we've touched on hair and eyes and I want to say a word about skin. Something new has bobbed up under the good old sun: a facial mask that can be purchased without mortgaging the old homestead to do so. In fact, you make disyere mask yourself, with a few tablespoons of a well known household and bath preparation, a little cold cream, and a little Grade A, or even Grade B, if you're trying to cut down the milk bill. The package carries instructions for mask-making for normal or oily skins, for a dry or sallow skin, and a very quick mask that is refreshing for any type of skin. It's simple, costs but a few cents, and does wonders toward reconditioning a tired or over-oily skin. Ze coupon at ze end of ze article includes a request for the name of this preparation.

Ze coupon also includes a request for M.M.'s present of the month. A remedy for that universal blot upon feminine skin-beauty—blackheads. Consistent application will remove them and, what's more, reduce large pores amazingly. Only a little of this cream need be used at one time. Try my sample offer, and then see if you don't want to keep up the good work.

THERE'S one beauty point I've never touched upon in these articles, I believe, and that's teeth. Of course, I feel that teeth are a dentist's job, not mine, but I'd like to say a few words here, on accounta I see so many pretty faces marred by terrible toofies. Good teeth are a feature every movie star must have. Jeanette MacDonald, now, have you ever thought how much her perfect teeth add to her charming appearance in singing close-ups?

* Oiliness results in unflattering shine. Dermatologists identify excessive oiliness as Seborrhea. Germs aggravate this condition. Woodbury's Powder retards germ-growth, helps subdue nose shine.

BEAUTY editors have written reams about Shiny Nose. Every girl who owns a mirror has pleaded for longer-clinging face powder. Yet what's been done to conquer Shiny Nose? Something startling! Woodbury's Facial Powder is now germ-free and helps overcome nose shine as it glorifies your skin!

Shiny Nose May Be Aggravated by Surface Germs

Dermatologists say the oiliness that makes your nose shine is often due to Seborrhea. Germs aggravate this condition. Your innocent-looking powder puff may be spreading harmful germ-life to your skin.

Now you realize the beauty need for germ-free powder that will convey no germs to puff or skin. Tested with 19 other leading brands, Woodbury's, alone, proved germ-free both before use and after contact with a germ-laden puff.

Give your complexion a seductive bloom with Woodbury's Powder, a surface loveliness that brings no aftermath of oily shine. The seven glorious shades are as natural as life and as young as you'd like to appear! Windsor Rose, for instance, a blend of creamy-pink and ivory-peach, is becoming to almost every skin.

This flattering powder comes in the smart blue box at $1.00, 50¢, 25¢, 10¢. Complete your make-up with Woodbury's Germ-proof Lipstick and Rouge.

Sonja Henie goes into a tricky routine for one of her skating numbers in "Happy Landing."

This is a cinch, she'll tell you. It's all in knowing how to stay on your feet.

They're absolutely perfect, cared for since childhood, with twice-a-year trips to the dentist, vigorous scrubbing after every meal and all that.

Your teeth needn't possess movie star regularity to pass everyday tests, but they must gleam with cleanliness and be decently spaced and set. If you smoke quite a bit, watch out for the tartar that forms on the backs of your teeth, and double the professional cleanings every year, for you can't get this tartar off yourself. Use dental floss once a day. At the least suspicion of a twinge, barge off to the D.D.S. I recently had the tiniest bit sawed off'n my two upper middle teeth. That fraction-too-much had kept me from having a good "bite" all my life and having it removed really did improve the shape of my mouth.

Pain and inconvenience? None whatsoever. Cost? Five bucks. Nowadays, too, wonderful things can be done about straightening very irregular teeth, no matter what the age of the patient. It's not cheap, but if your teeth really mar your appearance and you can squeeze out the money, it's well worth it.

Good lands, I've only space left to touch upon two other phases of movie star beauty this month. One is hands, and the other is legs-plus-feet. Hands first.

Remember such fundamental things as using a lotion every time you wash your hands, wearing warm gloves that are plenty big in cold weather (you should see the New York debs sporting angora mitts to all the swanky affairs) and buttering your paws with cold cream and wearing white cotton gloves to bed if you must do hard, dirty work with your hands. Put cuticle oil or vaseline on your nails at night.

And here are some hand tricks from Miss Carole Lombard herself, whose beautiful mits you see on page 40. She says that a coating of colorless polish, applied over the colored polish, will keep the varnish from cracking for a heck of a long time. She says that thick fingers will slim down miraculously if you massage the fingers from the tips to the palm—as if you were putting on a pair of new gloves. She says if you want to be "utterly-ut" some night at a party, rouge the palms of your hands and your fingertips, just the very least bit. And she says furthermore that a famous director told her never, never to make a gesture with her hands unless it expressed something definite. And that goes for everyone except Zasu Pitts.

DANIELLE DARRIEUX, the eye-filling little miss from Bordeaux, Fr-a-a-ance, who is soon to make her American debut in "The Rage of Paris," has the best looking underpinning that has hit these shores since Marlene Dietrich came over from Germany to sulk so glamorously on our local screens.

"Well, my legs would never stop traffic," says you, "so what?" So this: you can slim fat ankles by this exercise: sit on the floor, brace yourself with your hands, your legs sticking straight out. Bend and stretch your feet, trying to make your toes touch the floor. You can slim fat calves somewhat by stretching the living daylights out of them. Get some husky friend to pull your legs while you hang on to the bedpost or something. You can build up skinny legs, first, by building up all over if you're thin, and second, by bicycling or doing the bicycle exercise.

More leg-work: wear stockings that fit, fit not only your feet but your legs, too. Several excellent manufacturers specialize in short, medium, and tall hosiery lengths. If you're not particularly proud of your legs, wear dark-neutral shades, not too, too sheer. Not black, nothing is more revealing. Don't kid yourself that tricky heels, single and double V's and stuff, make your ankles look slimmer. Just the contrary is true. A black suede, high-heeled pump is the most flattering shoe in existence. If your feet are large, when you must wear lighter colored shoes, get those with a dark or contrasting tip, strap and heel, or some such arrangement. And, to close on a more cheerful note, if your legs and feet are pretty, glamorize 'em and dramatize 'em all you can. The sheerest hose, skirts the new short length fashion dictates. The silliest little slippers for dress-up affairs.

To do this, all you need is a pair of ice skates, if your name's Sonja Henie!

Now something on this order looks simple enough, but appearances are often deceiving.

Finale. Sonja looks just like a little girl about to make her curtsey, doesn't she?

The shops are even showing sheer black hose decorated with spangles for evening wear. This year, anything goes in the way of splendor and luxury. If you've got the money, and the pretty legs, Madame Marshall says play them up for all they're worth.

★★★ Hollywood Hotel

From now on, when you say Stupendous, Colossal and Gigantic you'll be speaking of "Hollywood Hotel." It's that kind of a picture. Loud and funny, big and dazzling, it offers a wide variety of entertainment for all types of movie-goers. It's the type of musical some people dream about, for the cast includes such vocal and instrumental favorites as Dick Powell, Rosemary Lane, Frances Langford, Jerry Cooper, Johnny Davis and the bands of Benny Goodman and Raymond Paige.

Story concerns a saxophone player who arrives in Hollywood to make good in pictures. From there the plot takes in everything from drive-in stands to the Hollywood Bowl. Musical numbers are plentiful, the best being "I'm Like a Fish Out of Water," "Let that Be A Lesson to You" and "Silhouetted in the Moonlight," sung by Dick Powell and Rosemary Lane. In the acting department, there is a gorgeous caricature of a temperamental glamor girl, played for swell comedy by Lola Lane, a grand portrayal of a hammy leading man by Alan Mowbray, and first-rate performances by stand-bys Glenda Farrell, Hugh Herbert, Allan Joslyn, Edgar Kennedy and most of the supporting cast. In addition, there is the presence of Louella Parsons and company to bring joy to the hearts of the radio fans.

"Hollywood Hotel" is spectacular, a bit ornate at times, but a really entertaining musical film. Directed by Busby Berkeley. —Warner Bros.

★★★ I'll Take Romance

You can add "I'll Take Romance" to the current crop of whimsical farce, and you can put it up toward the top of the list—if you happen to be a list-maker. Followers of Grace Moore will be happy to know that their favorite comes through handsomely, and most other picture-goers will find the proceedings highly enjoyable.

No struggling singer hoping for recognition this time, Miss Moore starts off as an established star of the Metropolitan Opera. Plot—if you can call it that—is entirely concerned with her decision as to whether she'll go to Paris or to Buenos Aires for concert engagements. She is about to leave for Paris when Melvyn Douglas arrives from South America to persuade her to change her mind.

Miss Moore sings everything from "Madame Butterfly" to "She'll be Comin' 'Round the Mountain," and handles her light comedy role with considerable deftness. Melvyn Douglas is perfectly cast as the romantic gentleman from South America, and there are splendid supporting roles by Helen Westley and Stuart Erwin. Directed by E. H. Griffith.—Columbia.

★★★ Every Day's a Holiday

It's Mae West to whom "Every Day's a Holiday"—and she makes the most of every moment. The result is one of the best West pictures to date. Though her wisecracks aren't as flagrantly wise as before, Mae gets in plenty of good remarks, in the same manner as of old, which have the audience chuckling from the first minute she undulates into view.

The story has Mae in the role of a light-fingered lady by the name of "Peaches," who has warrants out for her arrest in every corner of the globe. But Peaches manages to get around very nicely, picking up an ermine wrap and a diamond bracelet here and there—even picking off the cops' badges as they tell her of the error of her ways. Edmund Lowe is the copper who is most intent on her trail and though he earnestly wishes to land her in jail, it all ends up with the arm of the law around Mae's gay nineties' waistline. Another man in her life is Lloyd Nolan, a crooked politician who means nobody no good—including our heroine. Now Mae has no time for him, and after she's gone to work, the good citizens of New York have no time for him, either. Honest Edmund gets the mayorship after a gala election-night parade with Louis Armstrong leading the band and Mae playing the trap-drums.

Besides the excellent work of the principals, there are good performances by Charles Winninger, Walter Catlett, Charlie Butterworth and Chester Conklin. Directed by Eddie Sutherland.—Paramount.

★★ Hitting a New High

Lily Pons is perhaps the only Metropolitan Opera star in existence who looks good in a feather. In "Hitting a New High," Miss Pons wears several feathers, and nothing more, throughout most of the picture. Her feathers and her voice furnish most of this film's better moments, although Jack Oakie must be credited with a good share of its successful comedy.

The rotund Mr. Oakie, as a breathless press agent for a slightly goofy impresario (Edward Everett Horton), discovers Miss Pons singing in a night club. Horton won't give her an audition because he wants to get away to Africa on a game hunt. So Oakie ships the gal to the jungles, where she becomes a "bird girl," and Horton, amazed at her voice, "discovers" her. The story goes on from there, but you can figure it out when you see it.

Miss Pons sings the Mad Scene from "Lucia," as well as several popular numbers, best of which are "Let's Give Love Another Chance" and the title song. Edward Everett Horton does what he can with a highly implausible role, and Eric Blore tries rather unsuccessfully to make the role of a clarinet player funny. In brief, the picture belongs to Miss Pons and J. Oakie. Directed by Raoul Walsh. —RKO-Radio.

★★ Man-Proof

Myrna Loy in the role of "the other woman" is novelty enough to make this fairly interesting entertainment. Main fault is that the picture is too talky—a few jolts of action would have made it a first-rate comedy drama.

Miss Loy and Rosalind Russell are both romantically interested in Walter Pidgeon, a fortune hunting young man who looks up their financial ratings and marries Miss Russell. Myrna takes it courageously, and even acts as bridesmaid at the wedding. After the ceremony she starts a determined campaign to win the guy back, in spite of the pleadings of a newspaper artist friend (Franchot Tone), who insists that Mr. Pidgeon is something of a rat.

Of course, everyone knows that Myrna will wind up as the bride of Franchot Tone, but the picture has its bright moments. All four principals deliver spirited performances, and in addition there is a fine portrayal by Nana Bryant, as Miss Loy's mother. Directed by Richard Thorpe. —M-G-M.

★★ You're Only Young Once

The story deals with a family of four and their vacation trip to Catalina Island. Mickey Rooney and Cecilia Parker, as the children, have reached the "getting ideas" age, and it's up to their kindly father to keep them on the right track without losing their friendship. His task is no cinch, for Mickey has taken up with a

HERE'S ONE JOB THAT DIDN'T LEAD TO LOVE...

No girl who offends with underarm odor succeeds in her job—or with men...

A new job—new friends—new chances for romance! How Ann did want her new boss to like her! Bachelors as nice as Bill S—— were very hard to find!

Ann was pretty—Ann was smart! "Someone I'd be proud of," Bill thought. So he asked Ann out to his club.

The night was glamorous and the music was good—but Bill's interest died with the very first dance. Ann had thought a bath alone could keep her sweet—and one hint of underarm odor was enough for Bill. Others in the office noticed, too. Ann lost the job she wanted —the job that might have led to love.

It's foolish for a girl in business—a girl in love—ever to risk offending! It's so easy to stay fresh with Mum! Remember, a bath only takes care of odor that's past —but Mum prevents odor to come!

MUM IS QUICK! In just half a minute, Mum gives you all-day-long protection.

MUM IS SAFE! Mum can't harm any kind of fabric. And Mum won't irritate your skin, even after underarm shaving.

MUM IS SURE! Mum does not stop healthful perspiration, but it does stop every trace of odor. Remember, no girl who offends with underarm odor can ever win out with men. Always use Mum!

thrill-seeking young lady of sixteen—who is determined to have "done everything" by the time she's eighteen—and Cecilia has fallen for a handsome life guard who means her no particular good.

Mickey Rooney steals the picture with an hilarious portrait of a young man about to experience Life. The young lady in his case is admirably portrayed by a promising newcomer, Eleanor Lynn. Cecilia Parker is appealing as the daughter, and Ted Pearson does well in the role of the life guard. Lewis Stone, as the father, brings sympathy and understanding to the part, and Fay Holden does a similar job in the role of the mother. Directed by George B. Seitz.—M-G-M.

★★ Checkers

When it comes to having a good time for herself, Jane Withers can't be beat. And though some of her audience may admit it grudgingly, it's a pretty good bet that they enjoy Jane's good times, too. The laughter and handclapping of her preview audiences is proof enough, to say nothing of that latest consensus which placed the Withers gal right up there with the glamor girls for box-office draw.

As for "Checkers" it's easily one of Jane's best pictures—not only because it gives her plenty of chance to air all her tricks, but because there's a grand cast to bolster up the plot. Stuart Erwin has a made-to-measure role as the horse fancier whose favorite trainer is little Janie. Stu can drive as hard a bargain as anyone when it comes to the race-track—but he's such a softie when anyone is in trouble that he and his trainer very nearly end up in the poorhouse. Una Merkel regards Stu as the most romantic and exasperating man she's ever known in her life, and though love finally blooms, it takes an awful beating. There's Minor Watson, a dentist and veterinary, who is after Miss Merkel's hand and farm, to add complications, and then there's trouble between June Carlson and Marvin Stephens, which has to be ironed out before everybody's happy. There's the grand finale with Jane tearing down the track to become "the "winnah!" Directed by Bruce Humberstone.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ Beg, Borrow or Steal

The title of this picture represents the philosophy of Frank Morgan, the gentleman around whom the story is built. As casual as he's charming, Mr. Morgan drifts through his life in France, turning a dishonest dollar often enough to get along. His most lucrative racket is selling old masterpieces (about two weeks old) to Americans with too much money. It takes his beauteous daughter, Florence Rice, to turn him from a hypocrite and a thief into an upstanding citizen, and it all comes about through some pretty hilarious situations. In order to marry his daughter off in style, Morgan poses as the lord of a chateau which he has rented for the occasion and moves his "gang" in as scenery. Florence intends to marry the stuffy Tom Rutherford, but once her blue eyes have lighted on the caretaker of the chateau, John Beal, everything is different. Directed by William Thiele.—M-G-M.

Mickey Rooney and Eleanor Lynn do all right in "You're Only Young Once."

Jane Withers and Stu Erwin contribute many laughs in "Checkers."

Kent Taylor tries to impress Wendy Barrie in "A Prescription for Romance."

Maybe we're too easily pleased—or maybe it's just force of habit. Anyhow, we think Sally Eilers is a swell little actress and can make a "B" picture good entertainment any day. "Lady Behave!" gives her sincerity and friendly charm a good chance, for she's cast as the older sister of a scatter-brained babe who marries an extra husband after too many champagnes. Rather than see her sister thrown into jail for bigamy, Sally poses as the wife of husband No. 2 (Neil Hamilton)—who is very pleased about the whole situation when he sobers up. However, his children, Marcia Mae Jones and George Ernst, are not.

Things get pretty involved between one thing and another, before Marcia Mae, George, Neil and Sally settle down to anything that remotely resembles home, sweet home.—Republic.

★ Prescription for Romance

The prescription, in this case, is handed out by the lovely Wendy Barrie, who is authorized to do such things—being a doctor in an Hungarian clinic. However, this isn't a tale of pretty nurses and handsome internes. It's the story of one of the most ruthless criminals ever to flee the United States with a million dollars of stolen currency in his overnight bag.

Henry Hunter is the gentleman in question, and having left one blonde (Dorothea Kent) at the New York pier, he heads right for his other blonde in Budapest. Wendy would just as soon never lay eyes

★★★★ Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs

"Snow White," Walt Disney's much anticipated feature-length cartoon, is here at last—and it is a pleasure to report that as screen entertainment and as an artistic achievement it is a remarkable piece of work. Loaded with comedy and scenic beauty, it also has pathos and tragedy. So realistic are the cartoon figures that many people in the premiere audience wept when Snow White died.

Snow White, as you may recall, is the young princess whose beauty so annoyed her wicked stepmother that she planned to kill her. Snow White escapes into the woods and finds the house of the seven dwarfs. When she cleans their house and cooks for them they all fall in love with her and ask her to remain with them. Her happiness is cut short when the wicked queen, disguised as a witch, offers her the poisoned apple which causes her death. Snow White is so beautiful the dwarfs refuse to bury her. Then the Young Prince arrives—with cheers from the audience—and administers "love's first kiss," the only known antidote for the poisoned apple. There is, of course, jubilation among the dwarfs and the forest animals when Snow White comes to life and rides away with the handsome Young Prince.

Best of the comedy is furnished by the dwarfs and the frantic little animals who help Snow White with her work. Of the dwarfs, a cantankerous little guy named Grumpy and a moonstruck young man called Dopey will be most fondly remembered. Snow White herself is symbolic of all that is beautiful and good in the world, just as the wicked queen is the embodiment of all the evil.

Mr. Disney, take a bow—in fact, take plenty of them.—Walt Disney.

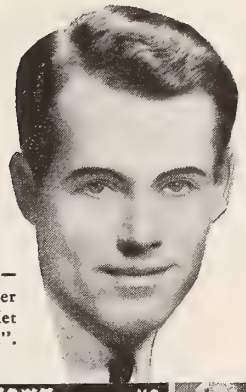
★Mama Runs Wild



When you know that Mama is Mary Boland, and that in this picture she's politically-minded, you have a pretty good idea of how wild things really do run. As pretty and as dazed as ever, Miss Boland manages to get everything in the civic and domestic life of her home-town in a terrible dither. When she unwittingly becomes the means of discovering some dangerous outlaws, it suddenly occurs to our heroine that she has been shamefully neglecting her duty by confining all her talents to running her home and husband. Having managed her husband, Ernest Truex, with such indisputable success all these years, she hits upon the plan of all the women in her town managing all the men, and thereby forming a community which would be the model of all communities in the country. Then the fun begins. Directed by Ralph Staub.—Republic.

★★★ Wise Girl

Miriam Hopkins, in the role of a millionaire's daughter whose leisure is devoted to shooting off foreign counts, gives an excellent account if herself. She has other things on her mind besides titles—principally winning the custody of her sister's two children, who have fallen into the hands of a crowd of Greenwich Villagers and Ray Milland. Since the children have adopted Ray on their own, there's nothing to do for the frantic aunt but have her go to the Village incognito, get in with the gang, and win back the youngsters. The fun begins from the minute she starts her new life and builds up to a hilarious climax after some pretty tough going for our heroine. "Wise Girl" ought to be a safe bet for anyone. spending spree suggested that he do extra work in English pictures until the time came when he could find a more suitable occupation. After the first few days of work, he decided that he liked motion pictures very much, and he made up his mind that he would stick to them.

Ann Sothern's selection of the best investment of her life is even more paradoxical than Ray Milland's. Her best investment was the purchase of two hundred shares of worthless gold stock.

You see, when Ann first began to earn money, she knew nothing about how to invest it. Quite early in her "financial" career, she purchased this gold stock, guaranteed to double and perhaps triple in value within a week or two.

"I was foolish enough to believe this," she said.

Today, she is one of the canniest of Hollywood investors, and she says she owes her caution to the phoney gold stock which she carefully keeps as a warning against gullibility.

For a long time Hollywood has been aware of the clannishness of James Cagney and his family. Nevertheless, I was surprised when James Cagney said, "The best investment I ever made was when I brought my brother Bill out to Hollywood with me to handle all my business affairs."

Bill Cagney, as you may remember, got several good picture breaks shortly after his arrival in Hollywood. Though James Cagney had hoped his brother would take over the management of his affairs, he unselfishly encouraged him to take those jobs when they came along.

But all of Bill's early training had been in business, and he wasn't very happy in his work as an actor. So he gave it up to devote himself entirely to managing his brother's business affairs.

"It made me feel good to have Bill at my side to fight my business battles for me," James Cagney told me. "Even in early childhood I sensed keen business acumen in my younger brother, and as he grew older I became convinced that he had the best business head of any man I ever knew. After meeting most of the business big-wigs of Hollywood, I still hold to that opinion.

"And, above all, I have a sense of calm security with my affairs in the hands of a man who is impelled by brotherly affection to make my welfare his paramount concern. Actually, the investment I made was only nominal, for the entire expense involved was the price of a railroad ticket."

Today, Jeanette MacDonald is even more famous as a singer than as an actress, but she would in all probability have remained a straight dramatic actress touring in stock had it not been for what she considers the best investment she ever made.

"Taking singing lessons was my best investment," she said. "Because I had progressed fairly well as a dancer and an actress, my friends thought it a silly idea and a waste of money for me to take vocal lessons. Practically everyone I knew opposed it, but being stubborn, I went ahead."

Anyone who has seen Jeanette in "Maytime" or "Firefly" knows why she calls this the best investment of her life.

Anne Shirley says the best investment she ever made was just twelve dollars and ninety-five cents—the total cost of the clothes she bought for her first interview with Director Al Santell, when she was trying to win the title role of "Anne of Green Gables."

Anne, fifteen years old at the time, needed that part terribly, for she and her mother were down to their last few dollars. So they used the money to buy these clothes, which were carefully selected to make Anne (then Dawn O'Day) look as much like Anne of Green Gables as possible.

The dress was navy blue silk with a navy blue jacket and had little blue and white checked pique collar and cuffs. The hat was navy blue taffeta.

So well did the director like Anne in these clothes that he gave her the role. Believing that getting this role was the turning point in her life, she changed her name from Dawn to Anne Shirley, the name of the heroine of the picture. The change in name seemed to bring her good fortune, for from obscurity she flashed into sudden success.

Joel McCrea believes that it was a twenty-five dollar investment in a trench coat which led to his first successful screen role. He was walking across the RKO lot in the trench coat when he was noticed by Producer Bill Sistrom.

At the time Joel was getting about fifty dollars a week. Sistrom walked over to him and said, "You're an actor, aren't you?"

"Yes, I have a small contract here," Joel said.

"Okay. I think you're just the type to play the lead in 'The Silver Horde.' Go over and tell Archainbaud to put you in the lead for that picture."

This was followed by increasingly important roles. Joel claims that it was his swaggering appearance in the trench coat that started it all, and he still treasures the coat. Rosalind Russell doesn't like to put friends on a profit and loss basis, but she declares that her friendship with Charlotte Winters was about the best investment she ever made.

ROSALIND had come from New York with a short-term contract at one of the smaller studios. When her contract was up Rosalind packed her bags and bought a ticket for home, deciding that pictures were not for her, and that she didn't like them anyway.

Her friend Charlotte Winters, the actress, begged her to remain in Hollywood, and suggested that she take a test at M-G-M for "What Every Woman Knows," inasmuch as she had played the role of Lady Sybil on the stage.

But Rosalind was so disappointed with the way things had gone in Hollywood that she would not listen to Charlotte's suggestion. She told her friend frankly that she had no intention of spending any more time in a fruitless endeavor to get somewhere in pictures.

In spite of Rosalind's indifference, Charlotte Winters went to the casting director, told him about Rosalind and asked him to give her a call. He did.

"So tongue-in-cheek," Rosalind confessed, "I came. And what a break! I've been here ever since."

Nothing like a swig from the garden hose when you're thirsty. Fred MacMurray takes time out from his chores for a bit of refreshment.

five dollars he invested in his first saxophone when he was in high school was the best investment he has ever made. He bought the instrument with money earned in a bean cannery during summer vacations, and played in high school and college orchestras with it. His playing won him a spot in the California Collegians Orchestra and in the Broadway musical, "Roberta."

At the opening night of "Roberta," Oscar Serlin, at that time talent scout for Paramount, saw a boy who played the saxophone and gave a half minute's imitation of Rudy Valee. At the time the name Fred MacMurray, meant nothing, but in that brief time Serlin got a sudden hunch, and sent for MacMurray.

On asking Oscar Serlin what he saw in the unknown boy, who has since confessed that during most of his performance he was buried by "two piccolo players, a bass viol and the rear of a grand piano," he said, "Raw masculinity, looks and an infectious personal charm."

If it hadn't been for the saxophone, he wouldn't have had a chance to discover any of these things.

Ginger Rogers' best investment was playing a small role. After she had been a success on the New York stage, she came to Hollywood hoping to find even greater popularity in pictures. But things simply did not break right for her. For six months, while her agent was looking for "important parts," she did nothing.

Finally she was offered a bit at very little money. Her agent was horrified, and her friends advised Ginger against accepting it. They warned her that she would be relegating herself to the ranks of bit players, and since Hollywood always pigeonholes everyone, she would thereafter find it impossible to step out of that class.

However, Ginger decided to invest her time in this small role. The picture was "42nd Street" and Ginger's clever playing of her small part resulted in bigger roles.

This investment in work colored Ginger's entire career, for she determined from then on to work hard at what she was offered regardless of its seeming importance or unimportance. As a result of this belief she did "Flying Down to Rio," worked hard at it and accepted third billing. This led to six more pictures with Astaire and to greater box-office popularity than she had dared to hope for.

Carole Lombard's favorite investment is a hobby, an avocation and a business all in one. She has derived more enjoyment and profit from a forty-acre parcel of alfalfa land which she purchased two years ago in the San Fernando Valley than from any other investment she has ever made. It was bought at a very low figure when land values had diminished considerably. With the expert care she has given it, this property is now worth much more than the purchase price.

Carole Lombard gets a good deal of pleasure out of running the farm successfully.

THE greatest investment George Burns and Gracie Allen ever made was their decision to adopt their two babies, Sandra and Ronald Jon. Of course, the adoption changed the children's lives completely, but it changed George Burns and Gracie still more.

Though they were always charming and likeable show people, Burns and Allen were at one time completely wrapped up in themselves; but today almost everything they do is for their adopted babies. Whereas they were once content to live in a hotel, today Burns and Allen have a home of their own, with an outside nursery.

"One day," she says, "I took Sandra down to George's office, but unfortunately he wasn't in. 'Oh, I'm so disappointed,' I said to Sandra. That night Sandra, fixing her large blue eyes on George, said sternly, 'Daddy, I disappointed in you.'"

The investment of George Burns and Gracie Allen was in happiness.

Joan Fontaine's best investment was made when she was only thirteen. The investment was a dog-eared copy of "Peter Pan," purchased for sixty-eight cents in a second-hand book store. This staggering purchase left Joan broke until allowance time came around, but she didn't care. The story was so real to her and came to mean so much that she decided to play it on the stage one day.

Most children get stage struck, but they usually get over it. Joan never did. As a result of that first childish desire to play the part of Peter Pan, she worked and studied and planned for a career as an actress, and today she gives every promise of having a successful movie career.

If you have saved a hundred dollars or two hundred dollars or five hundred dollars, don't despair because your savings aren't any larger. If you invest those savings in happiness, they may bring you a magnificent return.

HE'S A SIMPLE SOUL

Suddenly he leaned forward, resolve in his eye. "I'm going to bare my soul to you. Remember the gilded youth I played in 'I Met Him In Paris'? Remember how he took possession of the Ritz lobby and picked up the prettiest girl he'd ever laid eyes on, without turning a hair? That always reminds me of my own experience at the Waldorf. It was so different."

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Young were visiting New York for the first time. Bob's agent had made reservations for them at the Waldorf.

"I knew nothing about it except for a vague impression that it was pretty grand. I wasn't, however, prepared for the Arabian Nights. We were driven down through this subterranean garage, and came up through the basement, so the lobby hit us suddenly. We were paralyzed. We thought we'd got lost in an annex of the Grand Central Station.

"I tottered to the desk and inquired about the suite. It wasn't ready, because I'd neglected to tell my agent we were flying. I asked for the manager, not realizing that he was a kind of grand vizier, who sat up on the fiftieth floor and pushed buttons.

"Presently this dignitary appeared, looking like a diplomat at the Court of St. James. I couldn't very well ask him about a detail like bed and bath. But it seems I had to, if we were ever going to get out of that blasted lobby.

"He was most affable, bowed us into the elevator, had us whisked up to infinity, showed us the suite, which was breathtaking (so was the bill), gave us an armful of literature about how to find our way 'round the place, and bowed himself out, leaving us entirely alone on the thirty-fifth floor, looking at each other.

WELL, the thirty-fifth floor was pretty terrifying in itself. Besides, we were hungry. We didn't know whether to go downstairs or whether we were expected to dress, if we did go down. Anyway, we were too scared to face the hazards. So we decided to have dinner sent up."

It was Betty's birthday. Bob felt they should drink a toast to it. He went to the phone. Could they send up the wherewithal?

"You wish room service, sir?"

"I suppose so," he muttered.

Jigglings, buzzes, voices. Room service. Bob gave his order.

Presently there arrived a resplendent Ganymede, bearing a bottle on a tray. The tray also bore a bill for eight dollars. Bob gulped down the shock. "I ordered White Rock and cigarettes, too."

"They are coming, sir."

A second emissary, a second tray and a second tip. A third with the cigarettes. When the door closed behind that one, they looked at each other.

"Maybe we'd better not order food," Betty quavered. "They'll send up a captain with the bread and a major with the butter and a general with the coffee, and we'll have to tip them all."

They sent up what looked like a major domo with the menu, which was chiefly in French. The trapped pair chose food at random. Half an hour later the major domo returned with an elegant array of covered dishes and a waiter. He served them and retired, bowing himself out. The waiter stepped back four paces and stood at attention. Betty and Bob ate. They had to eat. The waiter stood behind them, daring them not to.

"What's he for?" Betty's raised eyebrows signalled.

"To snatch away the soup plates before we can get the last drop," Bob wanted to tell her.

"Couldn't you send him away?" her eyes pleaded.

"He'd probably bop me over the head," thought Bob.

By the time the miserable meal was over they were both so homesick for the simple life of Hollywood that Betty was ready to bawl and Bob to swear. Still they affected good cheer.

"Let's call Tom O'Brien," Bob proposed. Tom O'Brien was a shoe salesman and a dear friend. Tom O'Brien would put a different face on New York. They dragged out the phone book. Eighty-nine Thomas O'Briens stared them in the eye. Systematically they began to eliminate. "Riverside Drive sounds too doggy. Tom wouldn't live there. Forty-second Street sounds like a movie. Tom wouldn't live there."

Martha Raye and Ben Blue get together for a little hotcha comedy in "The Big Broadcast of 1938."

They boiled it down to about twenty-five and started calling. "Is this Tom O'Brien?" "Yes." "Is this the Tom O'Brien who sells shoes?" "Wise guy!" they answered, or they grew abusive, or they hung up the phone. Halfway down the list, Betty could stand no more.

"Bob!" She caught at his arm, as he was about to lift the phone for the twelfth time. "Do you know what's the nicest birthday present you could give me? Telephone home."

They got through to their home as quickly as if they'd been dialling from the next street. Betty's mother, who was taking care of the baby (only one baby then) answered the phone. They talked happily for a while, heard what Carol Ann had had for supper, what time she'd gone to bed, how cute she looked in her crib, with her pink fist tucked under her pink chin.

Then Bob had another inspiration. "You'll find a lot of Christmas cards on the bottom shelf of the cupboard in the breakfast nook. Look through them for Tom O'Brien's, and get his address. We'll hold the wire."

At eleven o'clock they got the right Tom O'Brien, who whooped out a welcome and bade them come right down. Half an hour later they were eating scrambled eggs with their friends and talking their heads off.

They stayed in New York for ten days. They moved to a hotel where they felt more at home. They rode the Fifth Avenue buses and saw Grant's Tomb and shot the chutes at Coney Island and "did everything all the other hicks do and never did get our mouths shut, there was so much to gape at."

Bob's no sophisticate. He's simple enough to be more concerned with the problems of a war-mad world than with scaling the social ladder of Hollywood. He's naïve enough to be in love with his wife. He's old-fashioned enough to prefer the pleasures of hearth and home to those of the night-club. No swing band could give him half the kick he gets out of hearing Carol Ann babble of the beauties of her new little sister, Barbara. Nor does love for his own make him smug. It opens, instead of narrowing his horizon. Because of Carol Ann and Barbara, he feels a deepening responsibility to do his share toward making the world a happier place to live in.

The J. Walter Ruben-Virginia Bruce wedding was a simple affair held at their own home, in direct contrast to the elaborate reception tendered them later the same evening by the Jack Warners, the Countess di Frasso and Kay Francis, who collaborated on a mammoth shindig at the home of the Warners. Hundreds of friends toasted the bride and groom, but the most interesting guest was a young lady who attended the wedding but didn't carry on at the reception. She was Susan Ann Gilbert, Virginia's 4-year-old daughter.

Carole Lombard items: Miss L. is one gal whose popularity with co-workers is not just publicity. They really like her, because she's genuine and because she never turns on the temperament. Most unusual thing about her is that she doesn't mind being mussed up before the camera. Most beautiful women in pictures dread the thought of a misplaced strand of hair, but Lombard has submitted to everything from dunking in icy water to a boot in the derriere. Seldom goes to night clubs, because she prefers a small party at home with only her close friends.

quit.' But whether I will ever have the courage, the initiative, the gumption to leave of my own free will is another matter. I probably won't have."

"But why?"

"Dreams come true too quickly," said Olivia at once, and sadly, "that's why. Youth is the time for dreaming, not for the realization of dreams. I don't dream any longer, and I know it.

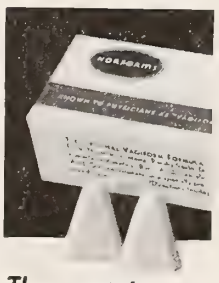
"I haven't had enough of being young. I've learned too soon and much too fast, that people are what they are, not what they should be; that life is what it is, not what I thought it was, and believe it or not, I resent losing my youth overnight.

"I didn't have enough of the kind of life I had up home in Saratoga. It was too brief, the time I had to dream the dreams all girls dream, I guess. For I dreamed, of course, that I would like to become a movie actress. I'd see Claudette Colbert and Bette Davis and Jean Arthur and the others on the screen and get terrific thrills and wonder what it would all be like. That's what the stars were to me and now, before I've had time to realize it, I'm that to everyone else. I dreamed that I would have a lot of money, bushels and tons of money, so that I could buy a very expensive dress and a car of my own and ride around, very elegant and noticed by everybody. I dreamed how I would adore to meet Roland Colman, but knew that that, of course, was certainly only a dream, the sheerest, fantastic folly.

"And then suddenly, all the dreams came true. All the dreams are true. And what of it? I can buy myself an expensive dress, not one but as many as I want. And I don't want to. That excitement I had in high school when I saved up my allowance for weeks and bought an $18.75 dinner dress, that was excitement!

"And suddenly, too, I was able to buy my own car, able to buy more than one car if I felt like it. I am a movie star and none of it gives me the thrill, the real deep excitement, the big bang I had when I played Hermia in the Hollywood Bowl. 'God,' I thought then, but reverently, 'God, to be playing in Max Reinhardt's production in the Hollywood Bowl, the gorgeousness of it!' And that skin-prickling, exultant heart-in-my-throat gorgeousness is gone. I miss it, I feel cheated of it.

"And then suddenly, I could meet Ronald Colman, and did. He came to my set one day and there was enough residue of my old feeling of the improbability of such an occasion to make me tongue-tied and awkward then. I didn't know what to do or to say. And that was all right. That was thrilly and exciting. When he asked for me to play with him in one of his pictures, it was too much. Too much, again. For if anyone had ever told me that I would not only meet Ronald Colman in the flesh, but that he would ask for me for one of his pictures, I would have thought that I had gone mad. Too much, all of it, too soon. D'you see what I mean?



"The only time," Olivia went on, "that I ever recapture any of the old feeling of awe and wonder and self-consciousness is when I am with Brian Aherne. I am scared of Brian. He is really such a great actor, such an extraordinary person, that he strikes me tongue-tied and pink. I nearly died when we were making 'Garrick.' He was so wonderful and I felt that everything I did was so stupid and inadequate by comparison, so I just nearly died of self-consciousness every minute of the time, which proves that there is some hero worship left," smiled Olivia.

"We'd have tea late every afternoon, an old English custom. Really, I was petrified of him, couldn't think of a thing to say. You'd think I'd have gotten over it.

Not hard to figure out what Jane Withers does with her spare time. Note the tricky outfit she wears a-bicycling.

But, no, not little O. deH. Oh, well, the day may come when I'll be able to talk casually to Brian Aherne, when I'll be able to meet Ronald Colman without a tremor.

"Now, with Basil Rathbone, I'm entirely different. Marvelous actor and dignified though he is, I can kid around with him. Why when we were making 'Robin Hood,' he actually hooked my skirt for me. The cast roared and a prankish cameraman snapped him doing it. The print is preserved in my album.

AND it's all wrong," continued Olivia, sombrely now, "for at twenty-one your pulses should hammer and your skin get goose-fleshy and your breath come quick and fast and mine doesn't now, not any more, not for half enough reasons and I know that this is sad, and a kind of a loss.

"The dreams come true and you find that you don't want any of them very much. And you shouldn't discover this too soon, not until you are old enough to have developed a philosophy of life which will take the place of the dreams of youth. Mine have come true so fast that they squeeze the very life out of themselves.

"And there is a sort of tiredness in me, too. I get a certain pleasure, still, out of being known, recognized, asked for autographs. I haven't had enough of that yet to feel bored with it. But at the same time, I feel the desire to get away from eyes, to get away from people. When I go home now I do something I never thought of doing before, I go to my own room and close the door and lock it. It's just psychological, I suppose. It's an attempt to feel alone, shut away, safe. I used to love to have my sister come in, share my room with me, sleep with me. Just let her try it now!

"I just don't feel real. I don't feel me. I have gained many identities and sort of lost my own. Perhaps I'll get over this feeling in time. But I am speaking of the here and now.

"I doubt, truthfully, that I will ever do anything about it. I have become too lymphatic to make any such drastic decision as leaving the screen. I don't use any initiative because little or no initiative is required of me. It is all a matter of what the studio gives me to do.

"As a result, I've become subjective and submissive and I am, or was, by nature, independent and self-reliant.

"It's a kind of 'what doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and thereby lose his own soul.' It is my soul I'm worried about. I have gained the whole world, the visible, tangible world, and there are advantages, of course. To me, the greatest advantage is that of being financially independent. I love it. I always resented dependence, even when I was a youngster. I love my independence so much that I don't really believe I could get along without it now. If I had to, even being married, I'm afraid I'd be perfectly miserable."

BUT if you should really fall in love," I said, "have you ever been in love so that you can say, with authority, how you'd react if real love should come?"

"Yes, I've been very much in love with a young man who was studying to be a doctor. And we planned to marry and I was to be a doctor's wife and live on his earnings and I thought, then, that I would be well content. Now, I doubt it. So that even this advantage has its disadvantage. For this is my problem now: Whom could I marry?

"I wouldn't want to marry an actor. I couldn't very well marry anyone outside of the business because I would know that one day he would wake up and discover little, old Olivia de Havilland of Saratoga and she wouldn't be the girl he'd married at all. And besides, girls on the screen just don't meet the nice, worthwhile marriageable men outside the profession.

"And so, I'm sort of coasting along. I've got emotional indigestion. I may get over it. But if I do get over it, it will be because a hardening process has set in, a sort of callousness to the things that matter to me now, an acceptance of the kind of people and the kind of values I can't accept yet.

"And I feel that we lead a very selfish existence. We all do when we are screen stars, because we must. Everything is done for us. We are spoiled grown-up children. For instance, if an extra on the set should have an accident of any kind I can't obey my natural decent impulse and run to the rescue. Not me. For there is a million dollars, not mine, invested in this property known as Olivia de Havilland and it must be protected. Or if I am on the set talking, perhaps, to a woman old enough to be my great-grandmother, an extra again, let's say, and a chair is brought, the chair is for me and I must take it. I can't make the respectful gesture to old age a girl should make, because I am the star and I must keep crisp and fresh and rested looking for the next take.

"I won't allow this revolving-around-me process at home, though. Neither will Joan. Not that Mother is the kind given to revolving, anyway. She doesn't feel any differently about us than she ever did. She still teases me, calls me 'Miss O. deH,' says, 'Well, Miss O. deH, come to earth, if you please.' No, Mother doesn't revolve and we wouldn't allow her to, even if she were so-minded.

"We insist that she have the best room in the house, manage the house, and us. It is her home and we are just the girls, living home as we were before we ever did more than dream about making good in Hollywood."

"MOIST-THROAT" METHOD relieved Cough Quickly

"I couldn't stop coughing," writes Helen Smith, Springfield, Mass. "I tried everything—then a friend suggested Pertussin. Quickly my cough was soothed and relieved."

When you catch cold and your throat feels dry or clogged, the secretions from countless tiny glands in your throat and windpipe often turn into sticky, irritating phlegm. This makes you cough.

Pertussin stimulates these glands to again pour out their natural moisture so that the annoying phlegm is loosened and easily raised. Quickly your throat is soothed, your cough relieved!

A cough should not be neglected. It should have your immediate attention. Do as millions have done! Use Pertussin, a safe and pleasant herbal remedy for children and grownups. Many physicians have prescribed Pertussin for over 30 years. It's safe and acts quickly. Sold at all druggists.

Even the big stars have to make tests before starting a picture, not of their acting ability but to see how their costumes and make-up will photograph. Bette Davis is shown here wearing a costume for "Jezebel."

ELIGIBLE BACHELOR

College, his main ambition was to get out of school. He worked for a time for an architect (his father was an architect) and then got a job in Liverpool with the West African Merchants.

When he saw other agents coming back from Africa with the indelible stamp of fever suffering on their faces, he gave up the idea of going himself and turned to the stage, hoping to find there, the freedom and excitement he craved. Now, he is glad that he is an actor, though he has often thought of what he'd do were he ever to change his profession.

He said, "If I ever do leave the stage and screen, I rather think I'd like to go into politics. English politics interest me enormously. The career of a surgeon, too, would be satisfyingly real. But I've had tremendously interesting experiences just because I am an actor. That is one of the great benefits of being an actor. All kinds of doors are opened to us.

"I met Marshal Foch, after the war. I was going through Paris on my way to Australia with a stock company. We talked for an hour or more and when I took my leave, he asked me, me, if I would tell the Australian people for him how much they'd helped to win the war. I managed to deliver his message over a wireless broadcast. Whether anyone listened or not I can't say.

"I met Hugh Walpole, too, for whose books I have the most profound admiration." At this point, Brian Aherne threw back his head and laughed long and loud, as is his way. He added then, "But the way I met Hugh Walpole! We were both dinner guests at the home of the late Richard Boleslavski. We were sitting on those high stools around the bar. Mr. Walpole was talking about his own bachelorhood. I said that I, too, belonged to the brotherhood and Mr. Walpole scoffed at me, saying, 'I mean a real bachelor. Someone who has given time to it.' Unfortunately, I got playful. I put up my foot and poked Mr. Walpole, gently, I thought, in the small of his back. To my horror, to the stunned horror of everyone in the room, he did a sort of flip-flop off the stool, landed square on the top of his head on the stone floor, turned a complete somersault and lay prone and absolutely motionless on his back.

"I could hear myself saying, absurdly, 'Mr. Walpole, Mr. Walpole . . .' We summoned doctors.

EVENTUALLY, after some very bad minutes, he recovered sufficiently to be taken to his home. When I offered to aid him, he cried out feebly, "Keep that young man away from me, he's violent!"

"And this is the black-out. Some while later, I was making a picture in which I had to have a fight with a policeman. I told the chap, an extra doing the bit, that I would pull my punch, that he should stand facing me in such and such a way, that the sound men would take care of the crack on the jaw but that actually I would just miss him. Somehow, in the rough and tumble of the scene I did not pull my punch and the chap came out of it with his tooth through his lower lip. Later, I asked who the man was, wanted to do something for him. I was told he was Walpole's valet. If I hadn't known better, I'd have sworn they were kidding me. They weren't. Seems that the fellow had been eager to find out what acting in movies is like and they had given him the bit as the policeman. Can you imagine what poor Mr. Walpole said when he heard that? I can!"

HIS interests, his experiences, his adventures range over every country in the world, every facet of life. He knows politics, the latest scientific developments, medicine, aviation, books, the theatre, Hollywood.

He talked about his recent adventure in flying, solo, across the continent. Of the five minutes or more when he and death met face to face. He said, "I had to make a forced landing in Pennsylvania, you know. I had checked in at the last airport and had been told that sunset was at six-twenty. Suddenly I found the sun setting in back of me and realized that I had failed to take into consideration that I had crossed a state line, the time had changed and sunset was at five-twenty. I had no landing lights.

"I had no radio. I had no co-pilot, of course. I was not equipped for night flying. I had a bad five minutes. I couldn't get my bearings, didn't know where I was. Finally, I thought I spotted two fields. One seemed lighter in color than the other. I even remembered how aviators, forced down in fields, have been sued by farmers for ruining their alfalfa! I aimed for the darker of the two fields and made it.

"Immediately I landed, farmers started to run out of the hedges. One of them shouted, 'Why didn't ya take the other field, young feller, it would'a been softer. That there's alfalfa!'"

But at our suggestion that too much adventure might have spoiled him for domesticity, Mr. Aherne was defensive.

"No!" he declared. "As a matter of fact, men who have been soldiers of fortune usually make the best husbands. My brother in England, every bit as much of a chain breaker as I have ever been, is now married, has two children and you can't pry him away from his fireside, even for an evening. When I am in London, I call him and suggest that we dine together as we used to do. He always evades. He says, 'The baby has a ten o'clock feeding. You know how it is, old chap.' When I tell him that I don't know how it is, old chap, that he has a nurse, I mean the baby has, and that I always supposed that was what nurses were for, he says, 'No, I don't think she gets the feeding the right temperature. I'd rather be here myself.'

"And the funny part of it is," said Brian Aherne, "I understand exactly how he feels. I will feel the same way myself.

"When I marry, and the sooner the better, I want the marriage to be a marriage. I would prefer not to marry a professional woman. A screen star is married to her contract. She comes home after a hard day at the studio, has a massage, has her hair done, has a manicure, must be asleep by nine o'clock. What kind of a marriage would that be?"

"But supposing," we said, "supposing you fall seriously in love with a screen star, then what would you do?"

"Then I would doubtless marry the star and—get into trouble," laughed Mr. Aherne.

room," she boasted. "Of course this place is fantastic, it's so tiny, but I wanted it because it is like a little place I lived in in France. And how I love France!

"Before I moved here I lived next door in that civilized looking house," she continued without ever stopping for breath, "and every time I came to the library for a book I asked the woman if she couldn't put her tenant out so I could live here. One day she told me her tenant had been called to Europe and I could have the apartment. Isn't it screwy? But that's the way things always happen to me.

"See that chair?" and she indicated an easy chair, upholstered in brown and green chintz. "I had the couch cover for some time and one day I walked into a store because they had a sale and found this chair, covered with the identical material the couch cover is made of.

"Vivian!" she called through the door. "Is the water boiling?" It wasn't.

"Well, then, you've got to see the rest of the apartment," she announced, and rushed us through a tiny passage way into the bathroom which, while not built to hold three people, was complete in every detail including modern glassed-in shower and tub.

"But I have to go through the kitchen to get to my clothes closet," she added. "Isn't it fantastic? But I love it."

She hardly sits still long enough to be described at all. Her friends declare that she bubbles partly because she is so full of life and energy and partly because she has heard that brains are not an asset in Hollywood and she tries to hide her intelligence behind a barrage of inconsequential chatter. If ancestry means anything, she comes by her brains honestly, for she is the great-granddaughter of Dr. Edward Jenner, who discovered and first put to use vaccination with smallpox virus. Another ancestor was Dr. William Jenner, whom Napoleon called "the greatest benefactor of his time."

For Mother deals with COLDS the modern direct way ...with specialized medication

AFTER ALL, it is plain common sense to fight the miserable symptoms of a cold not only promptly—when you feel them—but also direct—where you feel them. In dealing with different types and stages of colds, so much depends on the proper use at the proper time of specialized medication.

When Colds THREATEN

At the first warning sneeze or sniffle, or the slightest irritation in the nose—quick!—put a few drops of Vicks VA-TRO-NOL up each nostril.

VA-TRO-NOL is specialized medication for the nose and upper throat, where 3 out of 4 colds start. It aids Nature's own first line of defense against colds. Used in time, it helps to prevent many colds—or to throw off head colds in their early stages.

Clears Stuffed-Up Heads. Even when your head is all clogged up from a cold, Va-tro-nol brings comforting relief. It clears away clogging mucus, reduces swollen membranes, and helps keep sinuses open. It lets you breathe again.

And Va-tro-nol is so convenient, so easy to use—at home or at work. Keep it handy—use it early.

If a Cold STRIKES

If first signs have been neglected—or a cold strikes without warning—use Vicks VAPORUB, the safe, external treatment. Just massage it on throat, chest, and back at bedtime. No "dosing"—no stomach upsets. Best of all, no long waiting for relief to begin. For VAPORUB attacks the distressing symptoms direct—right where you feel them. It acts direct through the skin like a poultice, and direct on the irritated air-passages with its medicated vapors.

This double action loosens phlegm—relieves irritation and coughing—helps break local congestion.

Relieves While You Sleep. Long after restful sleep comes, VapoRub keeps right on working. And often, by morning the worst of the cold is over.

Proved in Clinical Tests Among 17,353 People

Both Va-tro-nol and VapoRub have been doubly proved for you—by everyday use in millions of homes, and by one of the largest series of clinical tests ever made on colds. For full details see the special folder—"Vicks Plan for Better Control of Colds"—which comes in each Vicks package.

GOLDEN HAIR WASH

AT ALL DRUG AND DEPARTMENT STORES

You'll see Bobby Breen against a colorful tropical background in his new picture, "Hawaii Calls."

SHE is an avid reader, this inclination being encouraged by the fact that all she has to do when she wants a book is to call downstairs. She had just finished reading "Outposts of Science," three Du-Maurier plays and "And So Victoria."

Her appearance is a surprise, because the real Beverly is so different from the girl you see on the screen and ten times as pretty. She is small and daintily built and her delicate coloring could never be photographed. Her hair, naturally golden blonde and curly, is one of her best features. "But it doesn't photograph well," she said later. "It absorbs the lights and from now on I guess I'll have to wear a wig in pictures."

In repose she is beautiful, with frank, clear hazel eyes and regular features, but when she smiles she is radiant. Her smile comes suddenly, with no warning, and is as warming as a ray of sunshine.

At the studio where Beverly is under contract, it has been said, "Beverly is a girl who has been kicked around. She's had a tough time of it and now she's sitting pretty."

She may have been kicked around, but she got the greatest kick out of the experience. Being broke was a lark to her. She never worries and, although fundamentally a very serious person, says: "There's always something to laugh about." In fact, she can make you believe that she has had grand fun having a hard time.

"I've never had more fun than when I've been broke," she said seriously.

Then she explained that, according to her theories, being broke is not a pleasant experience but it does have compensations.

"When you are broke anything that happens is an event. If someone invites you to dinner it is exciting. It's something to make a whole day. And you know, too, that you have been asked because you are wanted and not because of your money or power.

"Why, before I came to Hollywood just the thought of having a script handed to me to read; the idea of being able to say 'yes' or 'no' to a part; the idea of having a job in any picture, good or bad, would have bowled me over.

LIFE is a series of different levels. Every increase in salary, every step up takes you to a new, higher level. It's a good idea to keep your feet on the ground so that even five dollars more a week means something."

One lesson Beverly thinks important, is to learn not to want things too hard. "If you want things in a relaxed way," she thinks, "they come to you much easier. You can't make things come to you.

"When I was singing in night clubs in New York, I wanted more than anything in the world to get a chance to work in pictures. A talent scout saw me work and said I must have a screen test. She was sure I was just what pictures needed, but I refused the offer because I didn't think it was the right time. I kept on with the work I was doing but always in my mind was the desire to work in pictures."

There isn't an ounce of conceit in Beverly's make-up but she swells with pride when she recalls the comment a Pittsburgh critic wrote of her singing. He wrote: "She can sing songs in a way that would make Noel Coward sit up and say 'uncle.'"

After an engagement at the Town Casino, she sang in Jack Dempsey's restaurant until he changed policy and discontinued the floor show. Meanwhile, she had made the screen test, but seven months after it had first been offered her. "And just to show you how things always happen to me, the night before I was to close at Jack Dempsey's a telegram came offering me a job at Warner's Studio in Hollywood. I owed two weeks' rent and had $2.15 in my pocket but I managed to borrow enough to pay up and get out here."

Her employers have forgotten they hired a singer when they signed Beverly but she thinks it is just as well "because," she said honestly, "I'm not a good singer."

Guess who? Nope, it's Gracie Allen, all done up as a Puritan miss for her antics in "College Swing."

She recently agreed to remain at the studio for another six months, "to see what happens," she said. "I'm such a difficult person to cast," she explained. "It isn't the fault of anyone that I've had bad roles. It's just that suitable roles are so hard to find for me."

BUT her friends, in characteristic Hollywood fashion, have decided that at the end of six months she plans to wed William Keighley, a Warner director.

"I'm not going to get married," she denied flatly. "That is, not right away," she added cautiously. Later she said, "I believe the most important thing I've discovered about life is that the only constant thing in the world is change.

"Today, I feel that I couldn't handle marriage and a career. I feel that way . . . definitely. But who knows that tomorrow will not prove that I can and will be placed in that very situation?"

"Love is such a very intangible quality. Today it may be the fartherest thing from your mind. Tomorrow you may be swept off your feet. So I've tried to keep an open mind about marriage. I'm a firm believer in not crossing any bridges until I get to them.

"Like every girl," she continued, "I have had ideals about men. Most of them I have discarded. Things that used to seem terribly important to me no longer have the same value. Possibly because I've always been so independent (and necessarily so) I have acquired a much more practical viewpoint than rides along the beach in the moonlight, dancing in the dark and boxes of candy. It is so much more important to have someone there when you need him than showering you with the little attentions that most women seem to demand of men.

"Naturally, there are certain things in a man that I admire. There are some things

Many Never SUSPECT Cause of Backaches

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning shows there may be something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

An excess of acids or poisons in your blood, when due to functional kidney disorders, may be the cause of nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

I feel to be absolutely essential to love. For example, I don't believe any romance or marriage can last without a foundation of understanding and consideration. I don't think I am unreasonable in expecting this. I don't think I have ever asked anything of a man I wouldn't be perfectly willing to give in return.

"One thing I've always hated in any relationship with a man is conflict. I'd walk a mile to have peace in any situation. I don't mind criticism in the least, if I feel that I deserve it. In fact, I welcome any suggestion that I think will help me.

ONE of my worst failings is jealousy. It's not that I am jealous of women especially. I am simply jealous of anything that comes between me and happiness. Whenever I have had that feeling I have become actually physically ill. It gets me right here," and Beverly pointed to her stomach.

"One thing I do feel is tremendously important to a happy romance is for each person to preserve his individuality. Invariably, when two people are in love, one of the two is more in love than the other. The tendency here is to submerge oneself in the stronger personality of the other. That is fatal to happiness, I believe.

"But how did we get on this subject, anyway?" she asked suddenly. "I don't believe I have any business generalizing about love and marriage. It is much too personal and individual a problem to be discussed haphazardly, in the first place.

"In the second place, I don't know anything definite myself. Mentally and emotionally I'm two different people. I've worked out some beautiful theories in my mind but invariably when love comes along they are knocked into a cocked hat.

"I've never felt that marriage was the ultimate in life. Possibly it's because I have always had other interests."

In Beverly's friendship with Mr. Keighley, whom she met when he directed her in a picture shortly after her arrival in Hollywood, there seems to be mutual admiration and understanding. They like to do the same things and laugh at the same things. They visit the beach resorts, ride on everything and play all the games.

When he built a gas station recently, Beverly offered to be on hand for the opening.

"I suggested that I could give my autograph with every gallon of gasoline," she laughed, "but my offer wasn't accepted.

"This is a screwy interview, isn't it? But I'm a screwy person. I don't think I've said anything you could write. I wish I could write. I've always been ambitious to write, so I was delighted when the editor of the Guild Magazine asked me to write an article for him. I'm thrilled to death when anyone suggests I may have hidden talent. But days have gone by and I can't think of anything to write about."

A painting on the wall resembled her ever so slightly.

"Yes," she admitted, "that's me, but I had ptomaine poisoning the day I sat for it and the artist had mental indigestion. I keep it hanging there because I like the frame. He's really a good artist. See," and she indicated an exquisite painting over the fireplace, "he did that one."

One of Beverly's outstanding characteristics is enthusiasm and she admits she wouldn't want to live any way but with zest, and thinks the three most imporant essentials of life are tolerance, love of living and a sense of humor.

"And broke or not," she says, "I never want to lose my zest for doing things and my ability to enjoy life. I couldn't bear to be like a glass of ginger ale that had been left in the sun for a couple of days. I want to keep on bubbling."

homes are nice and warm, I can't find anyone to walk over to the movies with me. It's always, "Gee, tonight's Nelson Eddy night, or Al Jolson, or Burns and Allen, or Jack Oakie, or Don Ameche or sumpin'. The situation's awful. They say, "Oh, that picture's playing. Yeah, I heard it over the radio last week. It was good, but I already know the plot and climax," or "Come over instead and we'll sit and listen to the Lux Radio Theatre, a whole movie for an hour and we can spend the money we save on something else."

However, as far as I'm concerned, radio programs depend too much on the story and script. So, I say to Hollywood: Don't give yourself the air.—Mrs. J. Lieser, Chicago.

$1.00 Prize Letter
What's Happened to Eddy?

What have they done to our "Captain Warrington"? What has become of the tall, slim, blond fellow with the charming smile who captivated the hearts of the ladies in "Naughty Marietta"?

What has become of Nelson Eddy?

Of course, he gave two grand performances in "Rose Marie" and "Maytime," but I am sure the public wishes to see him in another two-fisted role such as he had in his first starring picture.

In their anxiety to give him music worthy of his beautiful voice, Hollywood has apparently forgotten his romantic appeal and so I offer this plea. Please, don't do to Nelson Eddy what you have already done to Robert Taylor. Don't rely on his voice to put him over to the public as you relied on Bob's good looks.—L. Sullivan, Watertown, Mass.

$1.00 Prize Poem
To Simone Simon

You're little and cute—
In fact, quite petite,
A little bit naughty,
And yet, oh, so sweet;
You really deserve
Far more, little girl,
Than what you've received
In the cinema whirl.
I hope in the future
They'll give you a part
That'll prove you can do things
To any man's heart.
I think you're a whiz
And just want to shout
Each time you develop
That cute little pout.
My favorite actress—
Just you alone,
The naughty but nice, Simone Simon.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE . . .

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up." Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. GLADYS GETS THERE which now will not even appear in the picture, was photographed, half the people on the set claimed credit for the pitching. Just why, I'll never know. It certainly can't come under the head of an honor. And I haven't any enemies. That is, I don't think I have!"

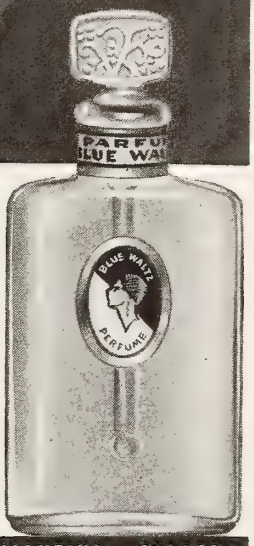
Perhaps no operatic star entered the movie medium more bewildered than Gladys Swarthout. Her fault, if such it was, lay in being too anxious to please. Everything she attempts is done with great seriousness, whether it is buying a hat or planning a house. She has always been willing to make sacrifices for her career. Her lunch consists of a green salad. Her "cocktail hour," a cup of tea into which is measured a teaspoonful of brandy. She retires at ten unless she attends a theatre or concert. If it is her "night out," she is home after the entertainment as fast and as soon as her car will take her there. She depends upon her husband greatly and strives to please him. His opinion is asked whether she is selecting a gown or signing a contract and his decision is adhered to.

The movie game still seems to baffle the Chapmans a bit, however.

"I can't understand," says Miss Swarthout, "how, when you read the story and approve it, look at the rushes and like them, that you can be disappointed when you see the finished picture. Yet you can. Indeed, I have. Maybe cutting is the seat of the mystery. Anyway, it all seems such a matter of chance and is like the grab bag at the church party. You put in your hand and pick something and hope to heaven it's good. And if it isn't, you can't complain for you yourself pulled it."

However, except for a few minor criticisms, the Chapmans have become very much attached to the camera coast. They have a house there now and entertain on a conservative scale.

Strange as it may seem, no opera star has made an instantaneous picture success. Grace Moore was a definite film failure when she started in pictures. She determined that the movie game would not lick her, and it didn't. Lily Pons' pictures have been pleasant and Miss Swarthout's first two were fair. However, the third, "Romance in the Dark," in which John Boles is again her starring partner, proves that she has "gotten there" at last. Yes, her voice and beauty started her, but sheer pluck and hard work were responsible for her making the grade.



Lily Pons visits Eddie Horton on the set of "College Swing."

guests at a nearby table.

Later on, when she was introduced to the entire room, the guests at the next table gave her a gentle but firm razzberry. Whereupon, one of Gracie's friends got up and took a poke at the worst of the offenders. The w. of the o. took a poke right back and the panic was on. Meanwhile, the cinematic song bird disappeared into the night and next day refused to comment on the previous evening's activities.

WILLIAM POWELL and pretty Loretta Young had themselves a whirl in our town and created quite a furore when they appeared together at the Horse Show. No romance, y'understand. The two just happened to be staying at the same hotel and since they're good friends, they decided to see the town together. Joe Mankiewicz is still Head Man in Loretta's young life and Bill just isn't interested in sentiment these days. In fact, he had just completed a European trip.

"The way to try to forget," said Bill, referring of course to the beautiful Jean Harlow, "is to keep going. Just don't give yourself a minute in which to think! When it begins to get you, move on fast to the next place. That's how I manage to survive anyway!"

Bill was planning to return to the Coast to make "The Baroness and the Butler" with Annabella. The story had originally been called "Jean," but the Powers That Be decided to change the title in deference to their star. Incidentally, actors have come and actors have gone, but William Powell is more popular today than ever. He claims that one of the reasons he keeps going is that his beauty will never get him into trouble.

Whatever Ann Gillis is whispering in Tommy Kelly's ear seems to please the young man. It's all part of the plot for "The Adventures Of Tom Sawyer."

"Even when I was very young, I never played juveniles," said Bill. "I just wasn't the type. Not being able to depend on my looks, I simply had to try to act. And so, even when I began my career, it was in the capacity of a youthful character actor."

Speaking of acting and personal appearances—Frances Langford cracked the record at New York's Paramount Theatre.

"I've never been more thrilled in my life," breathed the demure Frances. "You know, I haven't been in New York in four years and was sort of afraid they'd forgotten me. Instead, everybody's been wonderful. This has all been even more exciting than my first visit home after I'd really gotten started in pictures, and that's saying an awful lot!"

And so the movie lights come and go and, during their short sojourn, somehow manage to make even the Broadway bright lights seem a bit brighter.

NO longer need thousands of girls remain skinny and unattractive, unable to win friends and popularity. For, with these amazing new Ironized Yeast tablets, thousands who never could gain before have put on 5 to 15 pounds of solid, naturally attractive flesh—gained new pep and charm—often in just a few weeks!

It sounds almost unbelievable. Yet listen to what Miss Anne Johnston, who is just one of many users, swears to before a Notary Public:

"Under the strain of working in several pictures in Hollywood, I became terribly rundown. I lost weight, my skin looked terrible, I suffered with headaches and my nerves were simply on edge. Of course I knew I couldn't stay in the pictures, looking so skinny and wornout. I was in despair until a friend recommended Ironized Yeast tablets and I bought a bottle. Almost at once I felt lots peppier and stronger. My skin cleared beautifully. All my headaches and nervousness disappeared, and in 2 months I gained 8 pounds. With my new pep and new figure I've gained loads of new friends, and the hard work of pictures never bothers me."

Anne Johnston, Jackson Heights, N. Y.

Why they build up so quick

Scientists have discovered that hosts of people are thin and rundown only because they don't get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Without these vital elements you may lack appetite and not get the most body-building good out of what you eat. Now you get these exact missing elements in these new Ironized Yeast tablets.

They're made from one of the world's richest sources of health-building Vitamin B—the special yeast used in making English ale. By a new costly process, this rich yeast is concentrated 7 times, taking 7 pounds of yeast to make just one pound of concentrate—thus making it many times more powerful in Vitamin B strength than ordinary yeast. Then 3 kinds of strength-building iron (organic, inorganic and hemoglobin iron) and pasteurized English ale yeast are added. Finally every batch of this Ironized Yeast is tested and retested biologically for its Vitamin B strength. This insures its full weight-building power.

No wonder, then, that these new easy-to-take little Ironized Yeast tablets have helped thousands of the skinniest people who needed their vital elements quickly to gain new normally attractive pounds and new charm.

FIRST NIGHTERS

The mink and ermine contingent of Hollywood turned out en masse for the premiere of "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," Walt Disney's first feature-length film. Freddie Bartholomew and his Aunt Cissie were among the first to arrive. Claudette Colbert and Mrs. Ernst Lubitsch were also among those who so enthusiastically applauded Mr. Disney's artistry.

George Arliss and Fred MacMurray were snapped as they entered the theatre together.

. . . AND MEN CAN BE SUCH AWFUL GOSSIPS TOO!

Let's face the truth about UNDERARM PERSPIRATION ODOR

MEN DO TALK about girls behind their backs—although they won't admit it. Is a girl pretty, a good sport, a smooth dancer? The answer quickly goes the rounds!

They talk about other things, too. About the girls they hate to dance with—the girls they simply won't take out. For a girl must be more than pretty and smart. She'll never make a hit with men unless she is truly sweet—nice to be near.

Unpopularity often begins with the first hint of underarm odor. This is one fault that men can't stand—one fault they can't forgive. Yet any girl may offend this way, if she trusts her bath alone to keep her fresh!

Smart girls—popular girls—don't take chances! They know a bath only takes care of past perspiration—that they still need Mum, to prevent odor to come.

MUM LASTS ALL DAY! All day or all evening long, Mum's protection is sure.

MUM IS SAFE! Mum does not stop healthful perspiration. Even after underarm shaving it never irritates the skin. And Mum is completely harmless to fabrics—safe to apply even after you're dressed.

MUM IS QUICK! One half minute is all it takes for a dab of Mum under each arm! To be a girl men like to have around, use Mum every day and after every bath.

FOR THIS IMPORTANT USE, TOO

Thousands of women use Mum for Sanitary Napkins because they know Mum is so gentle, so sure! Don't risk embarrassment! Always use Mum!

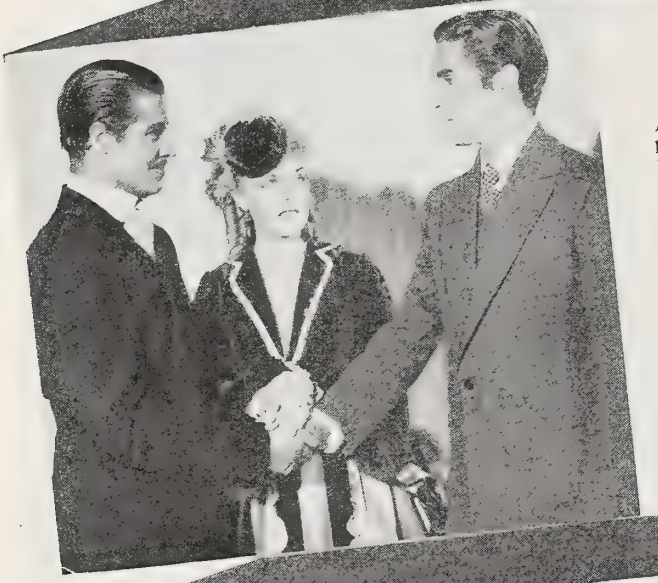
MOVIE REVIEWS



★★★★ The Buccaneer

Cecil B. DeMille's directorial efforts have here turned out entertainment robust and romantic enough for any audience. Almost flawless are the performances of everyone in the huge cast, while the photographic splendors of the picture are exceptional in every instance.

"The Buccaneer" is the story of that swashbuckling pirate, Jean LaFitte, who had all New Orleans awed by his bold adventures. With the bloodthirstiest crew of roues and renegades in history, LaFitte struck terror into the hearts of all who ventured on the high seas.

American ships alone were safe since LaFitte had one burning ambition in life, and that was to be an "Americaine." With New Orleans in danger of British conquest he offers himself and men to help protect the town. Distrusting his motives, the Americans instead make a brutal attack on the pirate's camp, killing, maiming or capturing many, with the rest fleeing into the bayous. LaFitte goes to General Andrew Jackson and strikes a bargain with him.

Fredric March is a gallant Jean LaFitte; Akim Tamiroff excellent as his ruthless but trusted boon companion. Walter Brennan does an outstanding bit as General Jackson's guard; Robert Barrat, Ian Keith, Beulah Bondi, Douglas Dumbrille and Louise Campbell give excellent accounts of themselves. Real feminine honors, however, go outright to Franciska Gaal, newcomer to American films.—Paramount.

★★★★ In Old Chicago

As a lusty and exciting chronicle of the growth of a great American city, "In Old Chicago" ranks high in 1938's list of good pictures. The Chicago fire, of course, is the film's highest dramatic point, and the blaze caused by Mrs. O'Leary's famed cow is in a class with "San Francisco's" earthquake and Mr. Goldwyn's "Hurricane" for sheer thrills and technical perfection.

The producers have built their story around the O'Leary's, and have made the fire and the growth of Chicago a background for the family's personal history.

Best single performance is Alice Brady's Mrs. O'Leary. Away from farce comedy, Miss Brady's dramatic portrayal of a pioneer woman is the type of thing for which they give Academy awards.

Ty Power is excellent as Dion, and Don Ameche turns in a fine performance as Jack O'Leary. Alice Faye, as a cabaret girl in love with Dion, has the best screen role of her career, and she carries it expertly. Others who deserve more than passing mention are Andy Devine, Brian Donlevy, Phyllis Brooks, Tom Brown, Berton Churchill, June Story and Madame Sultewan. Directed by Henry King.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Everybody Sing

Here is a musical comedy that is guaranteed not to bore you. For one thing, the story could stand on its own without the addition of a single song-and-dance number. For another thing, these numbers have a sparkle and verve that lifts them out of the customary stupendous but stupid class of entertainment.

There is Fanny Brice in the role of Olga, formerly of the Volga, but now maid-of-all-work (and no pay) in a theatrical family. The family itself consists of Billie Burke, who for years hasn't said a word either on stage or off that wasn't written by her playwright husband, Reginald Owen. Their two daughters are Lynne Carver and Judy Garland, who spend most of their lives worrying over their erratic parents. The other member of the household is Allan Jones, officially the cook so he can be near Lynne Carver, but in reality the singer in a night club. When Judy decides to save her family from bankruptcy the fun begins! Fanny Brice claims a share of the honors with her "Quainty, Dainty Me" and "Snooks" numbers. Allan Jones has an opportunity here to unbend a bit. Billie Burke is her usual charming, fluffy-headed self and Reginald Owen's ranting brings some of the most hilarious reaction from the audience. Directed by Edwin L. Marin.—M-G-M.

TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★ Happy Landing

Sonja Henie and her silver skates score again in "Happy Landing" and, as if it were not enough to see this doll-like Queen of the Ice pirouetting "in solo," she has brought an entire ballet along with which to enthrall you! Indeed, the skating sequences alone are worth the price of admission, for they are nicely spotted and beautifully handled.

First among her supporting cast, for our ticket anyway, is that ace of clowns, Wally Vernon. He performs a "strip tease" act for the edification of newspaper men who arrive at the airport to see the unreliable Cesar Romero off on a European flight. It is up to him to keep the boys entertained—and he does—with the audience shrieking the while.

The story is rather slight and of a familiar pattern, but who cares? It is excellent entertainment from beginning to end. Don Ameche gives his usual good performance, Ethel Merman tears off some hot tunes and Mr. Romero scores singularly in the role of a vain, caddish orchestra leader. The production is in excellent taste, high-lighted with comedy, pathos and good, old-fashioned sentiment. You will, of course, put it on your "must" list. Directorial credit goes to Roy Del Ruth.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Bad Man of Brimstone

A glorified western, with all the trimmings, "Bad Man of Brimstone" has all the excitement and pictorial beauty of a horse opera, plus a good dramatic story which makes the hard riding and the plethora of gun play plausible and convincing. The film is a natural for all lovers of outdoor epics, in spite of the fact that the plot never deviates from formula.

Wallace Beery plays the title role, and it's one of those parts in which his blustering and his over-acting fit perfectly. As Trigger Bill, he is a mean varmint, but when he discovers the young gent trying to clean up the community is his own son, he secretly works for the destruction of his own gang. A newcomer, Dennis O'Keefe, is the young crusader, and he is definitely top screen material, either in westerns or the more refined drawing room numbers. Virginia Bruce is the gal, and a prettier and nicer gal the West has never seen. She is pure gold, stranger, and audiences will be pleased, if not surprised, when young O'Keefe gets things squared and makes her his bride. Director J. Walter Ruben has done a difficult job skillfully.—M-G-M.

★★ Gold Is Where You Find It

Here's a lesson in Hollywood trickery. They take an old story, the one in which Buck Jones used to protect the old West from the invasion of the dreaded sheep men, dress it up with Technicolor and a cast of fairly important names, and tell you it's an epic. They're wrong. It isn't an epic.

Villains of the piece are the hydraulic gold miners who wash away sides of mountains in their quest for the stuff that glitters, and wash away the crops of the honest farmers in the valleys below them. All of this is an outrage to old Colonel Ferris (Claude Rains) and his lovely daughter (Olivia De Havilland) whose hearts are in the soil. Of course there is the handsome mining engineer (George Brent) and the usual complications resulting from his love for the colonel's daughter.

The picture is excellent physically. In addition, there is an exciting flood sequence which speeds up the film's closing moments. Mr. Brent, Mr. Rains and young Tim Holt perform admirably, but the feminine principals, Miss De Havilland and Margaret Lindsay, have both done better. Directed by Michael Curtiz.—Warner Brothers.

Let our reviews be your guide in selecting movie "musts"

Andrea Leeds and Adolphe Menjou in "The Goldwyn Follies."

★★★ The Goldwyn Follies

Mr. Goldwyn evidently sat down with himself several months ago and told himself he'd make a musical to end all musicals. He'd do it in Technicolor, he probably told himself, and he'd throw in everything from ballet to the Ritz Brothers, interspersed with large portions of Charlie McCarthy and Phil Baker. He'd even hire Kenny Baker, and thus have the only musical of the year with two Bakers in it. Then, since a musical needs actors to carry on while the comedians are going through their files, he probably ordered himself to sign up Adolphe Menjou and Andrea Leeds. So, patting himself on the back, he walked out of the conference room, completely forgetting one small item—a story.

We don't mean that "The Goldwyn Follies" isn't good. It is. It's a fine musical in many respects: the dancing of the gorgeous Zorina, the beautiful sets, several of the comedy sequences, for instance. But we had come, in response to an excellent advance publicity campaign, expecting the finest musical of all time. What we saw was a glorified vaudeville show boasting many moments of beauty and good entertainment, but its total effect is lessened because Mr. Goldwyn walked out of that conference without a story. George Gershwin's music is good, but there are no outstanding tunes. Directed by George Marshall.—Samuel Goldwyn.

Tarzan's Revenge

Tarzan really gets his revenge this time, but on the unprotected audience. We've always been one to thrill over the lusty doings of this guy Tarzan, but this time our only response was a mild interest in just what tricks the director would put handsome Glenn Morris up to next.

Glenn, as the new Tarzan, proved to be a trouper but not a Tarzan. Though Eleanor Holm, as the lady in distress most of the time, hasn't lost a bit of those undeniable good looks, she lost heavily through the weak role assigned her in this one. She might possess all sorts of dramatic powers, but you'd never guess it from the part she essays in this picture. Too bad, because the first picture venture is an important one. The plot also brings in Hedda Hopper and George Barbier as her parents and George Meeker as Eleanor's Promised. Eleanor strays from the African settlement which they all call home and falls with bad company. About this time the director must have yelled, "Page Morris!" for in bounds Tarzan to the rescue. Well, everyone tries awfully hard, so the picture has that to recommend it. Also there's a talented ape who deserves top billing. Director: D. Ross Lederman.—Principal.

SHE SAW A GHOST IN THE BED...

It rattled no chains and shook no bones—but there was an unwelcome ghost in Mary's guest room! It hid in the sheets, the curtains, the linens. Guests saw it with horror but didn't dare mention it—until Cousin Flo saw the ghost in the bed.

The very next morning, Cousin Flo told Mary—"It's tattle-tale gray that's haunting your clothes. Your weak-kneed soap doesn't wash things perfectly clean. If you want to chase out that mean dingy shadow—to banish tattle-tale gray—change to Fels-Naptha Soap."

And that was the end of the ghost in the guest room. Thanks to Fels-Naptha's richer golden soap and lots of gentle naptha, Mary now gets all the dirt out of clothes. The sheets shine so white—and everything smells so fresh and sweet—friends say it's a thrill to sleep at her house! . . . Why don't you play safe, too? See how easy it is to . . .

BRIGHT BOY

BY LOIS SVENSRUD

YOU THINK Stu Erwin doesn't know enough to come in out of the rain? But do you know what they say about him in Hollywood? That Stu Erwin puts on the best act in town!

For he's as smart as they come, this barefoot bumpkin from Squaw Valley. He knows he'll be blundering around on the screen long after the heart-throbbers have bit the dust on the cutting-room floor.

But he wasn't always smart enough to be dumb. There was a time when he wanted to outshine them all! He wanted to emote. He wanted to play Hamlet. He wanted to be tall, dark and handsome!

It started back on the farm. He would put on a performance for the hired hands at the drop of the hat. He was the pride and joy of his parents when company came—boy, how he could do "the curfew will not ring tonight"—and make it ring!

This state of affairs lasted through high school in Pertersville, California. The teachers almost wept in unison when Stu received his diploma, for who would carry the Decoration Day programs?

Since his father had advised his taking up a profession if he didn't want to starve, Stu decided to look into journalism. But after a year of it, and after learning about reporters' salaries, Stu decided that if he was going to starve anyhow, he might as well do it dramatically. So he took the bus to Hollywood.

He didn't try to crash the movies, for he just didn't want to waste time on the "bits" handed newcomers. So Stu decided to enroll in the Eagan School. It had a Little Theatre in connection with it. Stu played any role with emotional scope. He worked terrifically hard.

One day he was called into the office of the manager of a Hollywood theatre. There was a part for Stu in a new play—and there was a salary attached!

It was in "White Collars." But the role was Cousin Henry—a local yokel if there ever was one.

"Hold on there, son," said the manager, as Stu was making blindly for the door, "let's talk this over. Now Cousin Henry is something of a simpleton."

"That's right," said Stu bitterly, "and no one's going to think I'm a sap."

"But did it ever occur to you that that's a sympathetic role?" insisted the older man. "That audiences will love you as a sap—providing you're a fine enough actor to make it human. Don't make it ridiculous—make it humorous—then the simpletons in the audience won't squirm in their seats. They'll feel of loftier intelligence and will go home remembering you. Sure, they'll think the leading man is divine, but it's you they'll remember. Because you're themselves. The people they know. Understand what I mean?"

STU ERWIN understood. He set about then and there learning to be dumb. And because he was a bright young man it wasn't long before he was awfully dumb.

Every performance, he felt a deeper sympathy for his role. He played it forty-eight straight months. He wasn't making much money, but he was happy.

The play finally closed, but Stu was snatched up immediately to play the sap bridegroom in "Women Go On Forever" at the Morosco Theatre. He had been in it a few days when Winfield Sheehan of Fox Studios, saw the show. "That's the guy I want for 'Mother Knows Best,' that one who doesn't know from nothing," decided Mr. Sheehan, and promptly took himself back-stage to offer Stu the role of the village nit-wit. (Continued on page 128)

Judy and Bill with their famous father. He's never too busy to entertain them.

The Erwins step out occasionally, but to them, home is where the fun is!

Florence Rice and Robert Young on tour of their "Paradise For Three."

★★ Paradise For Three

In spite of there being nothing much to this picture, that nothing much is so good it would be a shame to miss "Paradise For Three." The plot is one of those mistaken identity ones, the setting the Swiss Alps, and the background Viennese waltzes. The characters are Frank Morgan, Edna May Oliver, Robert Young, Mary Astor, Reginald Owen, Henry Hull, and Florence Rice. And with very little excuse for a story, they all still manage to have a fine time and give creditable performances.

Morgan is the multi-millionaire who wins a soap contest for slogans, and is determined to accept the prize in person, the prize being a vacation at a swank Alpine resort. His daughter, Florence Rice, sympathizes with him and so helps him to take this prize-winning trip incognito to the other winners. Arriving at the resort, too, is Robert Young, another winnah. Through a mix-up perpetrated by Reginald Owen, Morgan's valet, Robert Young is mistaken for a millionaire and the real one is put in a garret room. Then there is Mary Astor to make life interesting for anyone with money in the hotel. Having seen through Morgan's incognito she has about landed him when daughter saves all. Directed by Eddie Buzzell.—Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

★★ Love On a Budget

This picture shows you how you can afford both love and orchids on your budget. Anyone would be interested in such an exposition, but it also has the Jones Family to recommend it. Shirley Deane, the Jones' eldest daughter, is now newly married to her florist, Russell Gleason.

They have the love and orchids, but no furniture in the honeymoon cottage, and the only reason for this lack is that Russell is staunchly holding out against his bride's pleas to make use of that great American institution, the installment plan. The crisis arrives, though, when Uncle Charlie comes to town. Uncle Charlie is a smooth talker and it isn't long before he's persuaded Russell to take a long shot on some bad investments. It's pretty awful, the way things turn out. Particularly for poor father Jones, who has at last had the honor of town mayor bestowed upon him. It's the best "Jones Family" to date, and with practically the same cast as in the ones before, you are assured of genuinely good performances by everyone concerned. Directed by Herbert Leeds.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ Love Is a Headache

This newest vehicle for Gladys George will provide pleasant diversion for most audiences, although the story material is not up to the smooth performances.

Story concerns Miss George's efforts to become a great stage star, and Franchot Tone's efforts to put her over via his Broadway column. When Tone announces over the air that he is looking for a home for orphans Mickey Rooney and Virginia Weidler, an alert press-agent pounces on the idea as a publicity gag for Miss George. Tone is genuinely interested in the kids, and refuses to believe the adoption is on the level. He kidnaps the two, and Miss George, whose maternal instincts have come to the fore in the meantime, catches up with them and takes them off. Tone gets back into action just in time to be married to Miss George at the point of a female sheriff's gun.

Bewildered by the situations cast upon him by his stooge, Frank Jenks, Tone handles his oppressed comedy situations with the exact amount of understatement necessary. The late Ted Healy, Barnett Parker, and Frank Jenks furnish an abundance of comedy, and Ralph Morgan gives another suave characterization. Directed by Richard Thorpe.—M-G-M.

★★ Penrod and His Twin Brother

Warners' second Penrod feature is a not too bad excuse to keep the Mauch Twins in the public eye after their work in "The Prince and the Pauper." Pets, parents, gangsters, juvenile G-men, and a case of mistaken identity are the lighter sum and substance of the picture.

Don't be misled by the title. Penrod (Billy Mauch) does not have a twin brother, but a new kid in the neighborhood is his double (Brother Bobby.) Although Penrod owns a personable pooch, the double owns a double pooch who is vicious.

The Mauch Twins handle their parts like seasoned troupers. Spring Byington, as Penrod's mother, is winning as always, and Frank Craven, Charles Halton, and Claudia Coleman are convincing as the other parents. Directed by William McGann.—Warner Brothers.

★★ Swing Your Lady

To really get you out of the doldrums, we prescribe this picture instead of your favorite alkalizer. "Swing Your Lady" is full of pep and punch and that old personality. A whole cast of hill-billies assure you the laughs, and the characterizations are ably handled by a cast including Louise Fazenda, Humphrey Bogart, Frank McHugh, Nat Pendleton, Allen Jenkins and Penny Singleton.

It's burlesque from start to finish, but entered into with such apparent enjoyment by the players that you'll be in the swing of the thing in no time and find yourself clapping hands and stamping feet. The plot concerns the local yokel, Nat Pendleton, who's fighting for Humphrey Bogart, his astute manager. Nat, though, just doesn't seem to have his heart in his work and things are looking pretty dark for Humphrey—until he meets up with Louise Fazenda.

Now Louise is a wrestler, too, and besides that she's the village blacksmith with large and sinewy arms. It looks like the perfect set-up to Humphrey to match Louise and Nat in the battle of the countryside. Nat thinks it's swell, too, but he reckoned without his emotions. For he takes one look at his buxom opponent—and it's love! With the plot go some hilarious hill-billy songs and dances by the Weaver Brothers and Penny Singleton. Miss S. (formerly Dorothy McNulty) is a personable and talented new Warner Brothers recruit. Directed by Ray Enright.—Warner Brothers.

★★★ A Yank at Oxford

In a fine spirit of hands-across-the-sea and commercial sagacity, his studio sent Robert Taylor to England to make a picture with Oxford University as the background. It's too early to report on the success of the hands-across-the-sea gesture, but commercially the picture is a howling success. What's more, it offers Robert Taylor the best role he's had in pictures. As a wise-cracking, cocky American athlete, Mr. T. goes to town with a portrayal that will definitely establish him among the he-men stars and do much to dispel the silly publicity about his "beauty."

Taylor, a star athlete in a midwestern school, goes to Oxford with the avowed intention of showing the English what's being done in the way of sports. He gets off on the wrong foot with his British cousins, but eventually, of course, everything is adjusted. The picture is most entertaining during Taylor's belligerent period, and sags only when Lionel Barrymore, as the proud father, indulges his penchant for chewing scenery.

Backing up the swell performance by the star are several expert characterizations by British members of the cast, notably Robert Coote, Edmund Gwenn, Griffith Jones, and Vivian Leigh. Maureen O'Sullivan is adequate in the feminine lead. Directed by Jack Conway.—M-G-M.

★★ Arsene Lupin Returns

Those of us who had given up Arsene Lupin, the French super-thief, for dead are in for a bit of a shock. He's back again, as a gentleman farmer in love with Virginia Bruce—both highly commendable occupations. Arsene has assertedly given up his life of crime, but he becomes seriously entangled in a series of events built around an emerald necklace belonging to Virginia's family. For several reels, skeptics in the audience will doubt M. Lupin's sincerity.

The picture is a fairly interesting mystery thriller of the smooth-as-satin school. Not particularly violent, it turns into a battle of wits between Lupin (who is admirably played by Melvyn Douglas) and an American detective (Warren William) who gets into the case in New York and follows it to its conclusion in France. The emeralds themselves are in transit most of the time—in fact, in spite of their ample protection, they seem to be the most accessible gems in all of France.

Both Melvyn Douglas and Warren William are more than capable in their assignments, and Virginia Bruce is both lovely and effective as the young lady of the piece. Of the supporting cast, John Halliday, Nat Pendleton, and E. E. Clive are outstanding. Directed by George Fitzmaurice.—M-G-M.

be sure of yourself with a clear SKIN from WITHIN

A SKIN that glows naturally bespeaks radiant health beneath . . . it is alive . . . stays fresh! So, be good to your skin from within and it will be good to you.

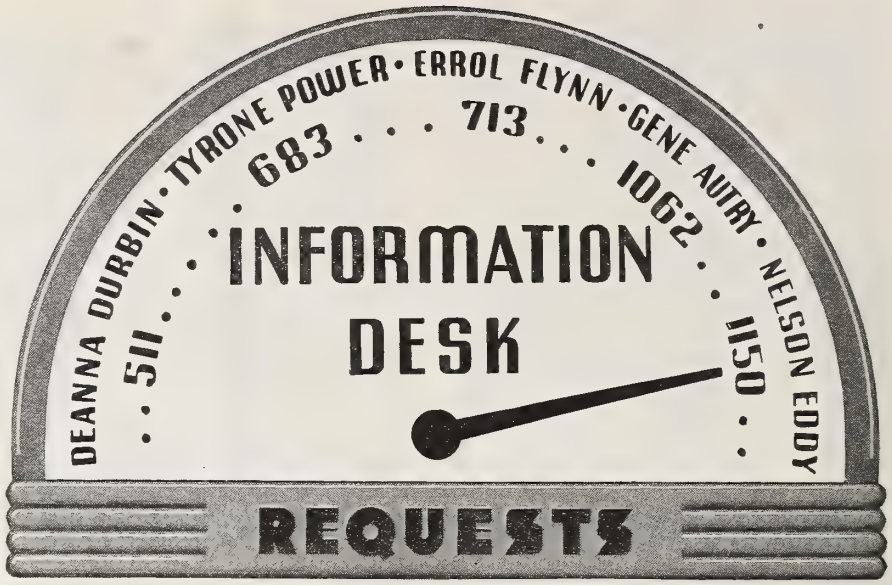
The reason for this is quite simple . . . skin tissues must have an abundance of red-blood-cells to aid in making the skin glow . . . to bring color to your cheeks . . . to build resistance to germ attacks.

It is so easy for these precious red-blood-cells to lose their vitality. Worry, overwork and undue strain take their toll. Sickness literally burns them up. Improper diet retards the development of new cells. Even a common cold kills them in great numbers.

Science, through S.S.S. Tonic, brings to you the means to regain this blood strength within a short space of time . . . the action of S.S.S. is cumulative and lasting.

Moreover, S.S.S. Tonic whets the appetite. Foods taste better . . . natural digestive juices are stimulated and finally the very food you eat is of more value. A very important step back to health.

You, too, will want to take S.S.S. Tonic to regain and to maintain your red-blood-cells . . . to restore lost weight . . . to regain energy . . . to strengthen nerves . . . and to give to your skin that natural health glow.



Take the S.S.S. Tonic treatment and shortly you should be delighted with the way you feel . . . and have your friends compliment you on the way you look.

S.S.S. Tonic is especially designed to build sturdy health by restoring deficient red-blood-cells and it is time-tried and scientifically proven.

WE CONGRATULATE THE WINNER OF OUR SCREEN STAR LETTER CONTEST WHO HEARS FROM ELEANOR POWELL THIS MONTH

EDDIE QUILLAN (first printing) From the time he was able to walk and recite, Eddie Quillan demonstrated his theatrical ability. He was born in Philadelphia, Pa., on March 31, 1907, and it may have been significant that the home of his birth was on Hollywood Street in that city. His entire family were theatrical folk and at a very early age he became an important part of the Quillan act, touring the big time vaudeville circuits with two brothers, a sister and his Scotch-Irish parents. His vaudeville experience, however, didn't interfere with his schooling, which he received at St. Gabriel's School in South Philadelphia. Later, he finished his education at Mt. Carmel. During the World War, Eddie served as a Four-Minute Speaker and did his work so well that Lieutenant-Commander Payne paid the youngster a signal honor in giving him a special memento of the occasion. In the early part of 1926 the Quillan troupe played the Orpheum Theatre in Los Angeles, and Mack Sennett was so impressed that he arranged a screen test for Eddie and his two brothers. Eddie's was the only one that turned out well and Mack Sennett immediately drew up a contract, only to learn that the Quillan family had left town with the completion of their Orpheum engagement. Mr. Sennett had to hire detectives to find Eddie, but he was finally located and there began a promising screen career. Since that time he has appeared in roles too numerous to list here and is at present free lancing. He's five feet, six inches tall, weighs a hundred and forty pounds, and has brown hair and eyes. His favorite sports are swimming, tennis, volley ball and golf. He is not married.

ELEANOR POWELL (second printing) She was born in Springfield, Mass., and spent the first sixteen years of her life in that city. When she was six, her mother sent her to dancing school, not to learn to dance, particularly, but to overcome her extreme bashfulness. The idea worked like a charm as far as Eleanor's shyness was concerned and she also became an excellent dancer. Her mother took her to Atlantic City the summer she was thirteen and Gus Edwards, famous producer of children's revues, saw Eleanor doing an acrobatic dance on the beach. He was so impressed that he asked her mother

We screen players may seem in a world apart to you, but in reality we are just like everybody else who works hard at a job. Making pictures is my job and the only way I know I'm succeeding at it is by the response accorded me by fans like yourself.

I sincerely hope that you'll continue to like my pictures and again, thank you for those votes.

Cordially yours,

if the child might not appear nightly at the Ritz Grill, agreeing that she would only be required to do one dance a night and could spend her days on the sand. Mrs. Powell agreed and so began Eleanor's professional career. Each winter, for several years following, the girl and her mother went back to Springfield where dancing lessons became almost a ritual. In the summer, they would return to the seaside resort and Eleanor would dance professionally each evening. Her teacher, Ralph McKernan, thought, by the time she was sixteen, that she should go to New York for a try at the musical comedy stage, but they wouldn't give her a job on Broadway because she didn't know any tap steps. Determined to succeed, she took ten tap lessons from Jack Donahue. After that, she worked alone for several weeks and just five years later she was given an award as the "World's Greatest Feminine Tap Dancer." Her first New York show was "Follow Thru." She wired her old dancing teacher in Springfield to come to Broadway to see her debut. She bought him a seat in the front row. Just before the opening of the show, her teacher died and in order to keep Eleanor from knowing what had happened, his wife occupied that seat and fulfilled her husband's greatest ambition in seeing his favorite pupil make good in New York. She appeared in many stage productions after "Follow Thru" and made her first movie for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in 1936. Her rise to screen fame was as spectacular as her stage successes and today she ranks at the top of the list as a movie dancing star. Her current release is "Rosalie." She has always been a great lover of sports. She doesn't smoke or drink, sleeps at least eight hours a night and is too interested in her work for any serious romances. She's five feet and a quarter inch tall, weighs a hundred and twenty-two pounds, and has blue eyes and chestnut hair.

BOB STEELE (first printing) Here is another son of theatrical parents who now carries on the histrionic tradition of the family by pursuing a picture career. He was one of twin boys born to Nita and Robert N. Bradbury on January 23, 1906. His parents were prominent on the vaudeville stage and at the age of two, Bob made his stage debut in a Fanchon and Marco comedy sketch with his father. His name was at that time, Robert Bradbury but he was billed with his father as the Murdock Brothers. When he was fourteen years old he began his screen career under the Pathe banner, making "The Adventures Of Bill and Bob," with his twin brother. He next signed with FBO and made numerous Western pictures, establishing himself as a well known he-man of the wide open spaces. Since that time he has made pictures for World Wide, Monogram, Columbia, Mascot, RKO, and Supreme Pictures. He is now under contract to Supreme. He's five feet, ten inches tall, has brown hair and blue eyes and weighs a hundred and fifty-eight pounds. He attended Glendale High School in Portland and while there starred in all forms of athletic prowess. He uses no doubles for the most harrowing scenes in his pictures and today lists swimming, tennis and horseback rid-

IS BARBARA STANWYCK STILL "TOPS" WITH BOB OR DID HIS LONG ABSENCE IN EUROPE CAUSE HIM TO DISCOVER NEW INTERESTS?

BOB, NOT long returned from abroad, wearing American clothes, tan and brown checked tweed coat, brown slacks and minus an English accent, joined me for luncheon in the studio commissary. It was his first appearance at the studio since his return from England some weeks before. And it would be any good fellow's idea of Old Home Week, for Clark Gable clapped him on one shoulder, Spencer Tracy on the other, Jimmy Stewart yanked his hair, Tyrone Power hulloaed to him, Reginald Gardiner made noises like paper coming off the wall and insisted that they were "ecstatic noises, welcoming noises." Myrna Loy and Sophie Tucker, Rosalind Russell, Fanny Brice, Maureen O'Sullivan, Judy Garland blew him their own individual brands of kisses; directors, cameramen, publicity men, members of the Press, gave him such a hand as would have warmed the cockles of the most frigid heart.

Bob consulted the menu, said to the hovering waitress whose whole mind did not seem to be on her job, "Something light, please, like steak and potatoes and onions."

"Hi," I said, "what about the fruit salads you used to order for lunch? You haven't gone roast-beef-of-old-England on us, have you? You haven't changed?"

"Gosh, no," laughed Bob, "not me. What's all this about my 'changing' anyway? You might suppose I'd been gone ten years in the wilds of Tibet or somewhere. Instead of which I spent four months in England doing exactly what I do here at home. The only way I've changed is that now when people mention the Champs Elysee I can look intelligent. When folks speak of the Place Vendome or the white cliffs of Albion I can adopt that bright expression of one who is in-the-know.

"I can also look knowing, knowing nothing, when old wines are discussed, the aged vintages of Italy and France. I can act discriminating about roast beef and Yorkshire pudding. When the low fogs of California chase me off the tennis court, I can wave it away with dour comments about the pea soup fog of dear ole Lunnon. In other words, I can lie more convincingly now than I ever could before, because now I have travelled."

AND THAT is true. Bob is much as always, for always he has had a nice dignity, a quietness, a certain mature fund of reserve which has instilled what in any other young man would be surplus good looks, with something deeper than looks, a something you respect.

Now that dignity is, perhaps, a little more pronounced; that quietness and sense of soundness and steadiness emphasized. Whatever of adolescence belonged to Bob Taylor, whatever of the collegiate, went overboard somewhere between here and England.

Barbara Stanwyck talked of Bob, on the eve of his departure for England, and she said, "Bob will soon be in England, making a picture. He will be away for four months, possibly six. Certainly when he goes, all my affection goes with him. That's true now, today, as I say it. Who knows about tomorrow? I don't. Perhaps it is the best thing that could happen to us, this separation. We have been together every day, every evening for the past two years. We don't know whether we can live happily, one without the other, or not. This parting should tell us, one way or the other. If we find that we can't, then, when Bob comes back, we will stop this dilly-dallying. We have a great deal in common, Bob and I. When Bob is in England he must go out, entertain, be entertained. We have talked it over very sensibly. We are not engaged. We are not married. If we were either it would be different."

Remembering this, Bob smiled and said, "Well, now it's 'tomorrow' and nothing has changed. We still go together, Barbara and I, just as we did before I went away. It is exactly, for both of us, as though that interlude, that interruption, had never happened. We spend all of our free time together, every minute of it, just as we did before I left. And we spend all of it in the Valley, at her place or at mine. We never come into town, haven't been in since I got back, several weeks ago. We sometimes go to a movie in one of the neighborhood houses in the Valley. We play games and listen (Continued on page 78)

HONEYMOON HOME

COME WITH US ON AN INTIMATE VISIT TO MIRIAM HOPKINS' DREAM HOUSE. SMALL WONDER IT ECHOES LAUGHTER AND CONTENTMENT, YOU'LL AGREE

SHE SAW it first from an airplane. A Continental-looking house with a single turret, standing on a promontory overlooking the whole of San Gabriel Valley and the sea. Behind it rose the mountains, picturesque, dark, verdant.

"What a perfectly perfect spot!" said Miriam Hopkins.

"It belongs to John Gilbert," explained the stewardess. It was the home he had brought Virginia Bruce to as a bride. The place where he had arranged for her the most luxurious suite in the whole luxury-loving Hollywood. A lush Louis XVI white satin wonder suite with solid gold fittings in the bath.

Later, after Gilbert's death, the place was auctioned off to a mysterious buyer. Some said it was Marlene Dietrich. Some, a Spanish refugee princess. It turned out to be Miriam Hopkins.

Slim, blonde, scintillating Miriam. The girl who swishes through life on the tail of a comet. Here today, off to Europe tomorrow. Irrepressibly gay and gathering momentum as she goes. How would she transform that house into a background for herself? Frankly, I thought it was going to be French. French and feminine as a lace frill. It's neither. It's almost strikingly simple. I don't know what happened to the gold faucets, but they're not there. Not a touch of frou-frou in sight.

"I loathe the word 'modern'," declared Miriam, who happens to be as modern herself as a Thurber drawing. "Please call my house anything but that!" I call it charming.

She never does anything by halves. She sent for an interior decorator and worked with him in a fine frenzy until the last ash tray was in place. So that when you see her house you see Miriam. Her own ideas and her personality are reflected in it as if it were a pier glass.

Shortly after she moved in she came to a certain decision—and Hollywood pricked up its ears over the news flash: "Miriam Hopkins Weds Director Anton Litvak in Yuma." Litvak, who is blonde and laughing, too, and as big as Miriam is small. (Strangely, they fell in love while he was directing her in "The Woman I Love!")

"Do I carry you through the door even though you've been here before?" he teased.

"Indeed you do!" said young Mrs. Litvak. The house echoes their laughter, their deep contentment.

When each of your rooms blends into the others

The outdoor living-room is a jolly place, all in white duck with nautical blue trim and bamboo wood. Much fun is had here.

The master's bedroom is done in creamy white, burgundy red and old mahogany. Miriam, as Becky Sharp, is on the wall.

BY VIRGINIA T. LANE

The master and the mistress of Honeymoon Home fell in love while he was directing her in "The Woman I Love."

—that's harmony! When they blend with your own individual coloring—that's smart! For instance, every time Miriam, with that mop of gold hair of hers, walks into her living-room it springs to life. You can imagine—with great yellow and copper bowls on the tables and walls of the softest hydrangea blue. And what it does for her eyes! You find it repeated in that Metisse painting hanging over the old Italian cabinet, in the 18th century Chinese lamps sitting at the end of the sofas. Usually there are giant bowls of hydrangea to add the final touch. Harmony plus!

Miriam never sits on a chair when she can help it. She sits on the floor or on those ivory leather hassocks. "Stark white in a house always reminds me of chloroform and ambulance clanging. So," she explained, "we used old ivory." It's the color of the two hand-tufted rugs sweeping down the floor, and of the giant fabric couches drawn up for a view of the grate fire. The other color accent in the room is brown. (Continued on page 84)

Regiments of books march up and down the walls on either side of the fireplace in the large living-room.

LOVE IS OUT!

BY JAMES REID

"I've given up a lot to become a singer," declares Nelson Eddy. "There are books I'd like to read and shows to see, but I haven't the time for either."

Nelson has luncheon in the studio commissary with Eleanor Powell. A new romantic duo? Just you step up to Mr. Eddy and ask that question. We dare you.

ROMANCE RUMORS HOUND NELSON EDDY EVEN AS BILL COLLECTORS HOUND YOU AND ME—BUT I' ISN'T HIS HEART THAT HAS HIM WORRIED

In "The Girl Of The Golden West," Nelson has his most colorful role to date, and a musical score that should delight his fans. Yep, Jeanette MacDonald is the lucky gal again.

AT THE head of a singularly happy-go-lucky group of bandits, Nelson Eddy swings down the dusty road, astride a golden-brown horse. He is their chief, Ramerrez.

On his head is a price of five thousand dollars, gold. Also on his head, is a tremendous Mexican sombrero. Over one shoulder is slung a colorful Mexican serape. His clothes are the leather ones of a hard-riding hombre of 1848.

On one side of him is Leo Carrillo, his face creased with that familiar Carrillo smile. On the other side is Leonard Penn, looking unfamiliar with a long scar (strictly make-up) on one cheek. Behind them, also on horseback, string a nondescript crew of cut-throats, loaded down with loot.

Apparently indifferent to possible pursuers, they are all singing a robust song about a playful mosquito. But the focus of attention is their leader. A carefree caballero, singing handsomely on a handsome horse.

Thus does Nelson Eddy make his entrance in "The Girl of the Golden West." A highly effective entrance. No member of any audience will be inclined to deny Jeanette MacDonald the pleasure, later in the script, of falling in love with him.

It isn't too difficult, seeing him and hearing him, to get the idea that he could be Caballero Number One of Hollywood without much struggle, if he were really interested. But he isn't. He told me so. We were in his dressing-room, after the day's shooting.

"Don't talk to me about love, or expect me to talk about love," he said, pointedly. "I'll talk about anything else under the sun. But that subject is out.

"Maybe I'm in love, and maybe I'm not," he went on. "Either way, it's strictly my business. If I keep my mouth shut about it, I can't hurt anybody.

PEOPLE TRY to tell me I'm hurting myself, not encouraging more romance rumors. Don't worry, I don't have to encourage them. They'll print them anyway, true or not.

"It may be a matter of curiosity whether movie stars are, or are not, in love. But it isn't a matter of importance, except to the stars concerned. The only thing about them that's important, in the long run, is: 'How are they doing their jobs?' All right, I'm not forgetting that.

"I don't go out, running newspapers," he continued. "I fail to see why I should let the newspapers run my life. When I go out, I want to go out for fun, not publicity. When I give a party, I want my friends to have the feeling that it's for them, not for publicity. I may have a dozen people in, or forty, but there won't be a columnist, or a reporter, or a photographer in the crowd. I don't like to embarrass my guests. I believe in letting them relax.

"But don't get me started on this subject of a right to a private life, part of the time, or we'll both be here till tomorrow morning.

"And don't get me wrong. Don't get the notion that I'm a big party man in secret. I'm not. I just want to put across the (Continued on page 76)

Claudette and Gary Cooper are getting set here for a scene from "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife." It should have been a love scene but Mlle. Colbert had a cold Gary might catch.

Maybe Gary looks like this because he and Claudette have just finished ninety-two dollars' worth of caviar in three days, and they both loathe it!

BY GLADYS HALL

AT A TEA in New York some ten years ago, a fellow guest said to a dark, shy girl named Lily Cauchoin, "You ought to go on the stage, my dear." The fellow guest may have been making a pleasant remark to a pleasant youngster, just to pass the time of day. Or she may have had the gift of second sight. Whichever the motivation, the dark, shy girl said, "How?" The guest replied, rather vaguely, that she happened to be a friend of a friend of Ann Morrison, the playwright, and that she could introduce Mademoiselle Cauchoin to Miss Morrison. "When?" asked Lily Cauchoin.

Pinned down, thus, by a force far stronger than the drifts of pleasant chit-chat at a party, the friend of the friend effected the introduction and Lily Cauchoin, re-christened Claudette Colbert (because her mother always called her Claudette, though she doesn't know why) got a three-line part in "The Wild Westcotts."

Now, mind you, Lily Cauchoin, not long arrived from France, not long bereaved of her father, had never so much as dreamed of going on the stage. She had planned to become a dress designer, possibly an artist. She knew that she had to earn her own living. More importantly, she knew that she could. Essentially independent, she had no doubt that she could make her own way in the world. But that that world would be the theatre world was as far from her imagining as that she should suddenly be offered a job in the mythical Land of Oz. The stage had simply not occurred to her. But when it did occur to her, she acted with such directness of purpose that any little obstacles which might have cluttered the pathway of a less realistic young person, fell over like the frail toy ninepins with which children play.

This is all very sedate and pleasant, but the day before Gary and Claudette slapped each other for hours, as part of the plot, of course.

It appears as though Claudette might be singing here, but in the picture Gary makes his singing debut, with "Lookie, Lookie, Here Comes Cookie."

Which provides Key No. 1 to the fundamental character of Claudette, now as then.

For Claudette is a realist, not a romanticist. She didn't go about dreaming that she might go on the stage, dramatizing herself. But when the opportunity came to go on the stage, she seized it with both her practical young hands. I said to her, just to check my own conclusion, "You are really a realist, aren't you?" And she said, "Oh, but definitely." She added, "I don't believe that the moon is made of green cheese, you know. I'm not that realistic. But neither do I believe that it is inhabited by a sloe-eyed gentleman made of ectoplasm."

And so there she was, on the stage. And those three lines were, for the young novice, three whips that scourged her. For she was completely lacking, then, in self-confidence, in self-assurance, not to mention her enormous lack of experience. But being a realist, and French, and practical, she held firmly to her one major motivation, which was that she had to earn her living and that here it was, on the stage, laid in her lap by a lady at a tea party.

The career of Claudette began as a mixture, a blend, of chance, courage, opportunism and necessity.

Having survived the run of her three lines, she was recommended to Brock Pemberton for the leading role in "The Marionette Man." She got it, but the play was a dismal failure, with such slams from the critics as "The play was bad enough but Colbert was worse."

In spite of this, however, other plays followed. "A run of luck" she calls it, for Claudette was then, and is now, riddled with superstitions.

She said, the other day, in her portable dressing-room on the set of "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife," "I am horribly superstitious. I believe that luck runs or it doesn't. And when it doesn't, you'd better rest your feet, too. I shudder at the sight of a black cat. I say 'bread and butter' whenever indicated. I make wishes on hay wagons. I look at the moon over my left shoulder. If I break a mirror I have a nervous breakdown myself. I had a spasm when Marlene Dietrich told me one time that if you look at the moon through glass, it doesn't do any good. I've nearly caught my death of cold ever since, running out in the rain and cold to look at the moon over my left shoulder with no window glass intervening."

TODAY, Claudette has completed the conquest of Broadway, and put Hollywood into her make-up box and walked home with it, trailing the stardust of such spectacular successes as "The Gilded Lily," "Maid Of Salem," "I Met Him In Paris," "It Happened One Night," "Imitation Of Life," "Private Worlds," "She Married Her Boss," "Tovarich" and, now, "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife." She is happily married to Dr. Joel Pressman, has built her own home to her own taste, her mother with her, her friends about her, contracts and offers of contracts literally falling on her dark, unturned head.

But how is she? What is she, now? (Cont'd on page 115)

HOW TO BE RUDE POLITELY

HAVE YOU EVER FELT THE URGE TO BE IN-

BY IDA ZEITLIN

WHEN A man is by nature courteous, as Bill Powell is, yet finds himself on occasion in a spot where the ordinary forms of courtesy do him no good, there ensues a problem.

The problem is how to be rude politely.

Powell has solved it to his own satisfaction and, judging from his reputation for good manners, also to the satisfaction of all concerned.

When I asked him to describe his system, he said, "System? Perish the thought. I close my eyes and trust to my mother instinct. Wait a minute, though. There is one rule that works under certain conditions. Rule: Say all the bitter things that boil within you, but keep your mouth shut. In other words, preserve an impassive front and say them to yourself. Thus you purge your spirit of venom, yet hurt no one, killing two birds with one stone,

Bill has a constitutional objection to getting up in the morning, which his man Theodore completely ignores. Mr. P. has a trick way of dealing with the situation.

William Powell may be a celebrity to the fans but at home he's just Mr. and Mrs. Powell's Bill.

which they taught me at school was an admirable feat. Myself, I don't hold with bird-killing, two stones or one. Some of my best friends are birds."

Mr. Powell likes to go off on tangents. The faraway hills look greenest, and his nimble mind leaps goatlike from peak to peak, to nibble at a juicy quirk here or a fresh fancy there. This is partly good spirits, partly a flair for adventures of the imagination. I drew him back to the point.

"Oh, yes, well, that's a method I apply mostly in the mornings. You see, I have a constitutional objection to getting up. There's no particular harm in it, really just a lovable idiosyncrasy except that, being a son of Adam, I must toil. When one toils, as you may have discovered for yourself, one toils by the clock. And I hate clocks. I was born prematurely, and I think I've been trying to catch up with myself ever since. I was built to saunter, not to gallop. I am known about the studios as Flash Powell, with two speeds, Slow and Stop. There are times when this feud between me and a clock develops into something like a mania.

"I remember, for example, when Dick Barthelmess and I were living in Great Neck and working on a picture in New York. It became a contest as to which of us could get up last, and still make (Continued on page 98)

We'll let you in on a secret. Some of Bill Powell's best friends are birds. He says so himself.

DEBUNKING DAVIS

Sweet and demure might be the words for Bette here, but she insists she's neither. And she'll always speak her piece, out loud, too!

NEVER EXPECT BETTE DAVIS TO TELL THE TRUTH ABOUT HERSELF BECAUSE SHE DOESN'T KNOW HOW, BUT OUR TOP NOTCH "INVESTIGATORS" SEE ALL, KNOW ALL AND WHAT'S MORE—DISCLOSE ALL!

BETTE DAVIS' blue eyes were bright with fury. She got up from the divan, picked up a magazine that was lying on her library table, and flung it open contemptuously. Then, her voice like a whip, she read, "I know that a blonde (the type I am) is supposed to be something of a gaiety girl—in for fun and petting parties and gin and this modern thing called 'freedom.' I never have any fun. I couldn't swallow gin. Petting would turn my tummy upside down.

"That writer was supposed to be quoting me," she said, her voice rising angrily. "What are people supposed to believe, that I read nothing but grave books and medical essays? Why, all my life I've never had anything but fun. And as for not liking the taste of gin, I guess I can drink as much as most girls. What will people think of me?" she demanded indignantly.

Bette didn't know how funny she was being; how utterly incomprehensible from an interviewer's point of view. For it is something unheard of in Hollywood for an actress to resent being painted as better than she really is. Most Hollywood girls would like to be portrayed as little tin angels. They think that the fans might be shocked to know that they dyed their hair. They would rather the public didn't know how much and what they drank.

Hollywood is full of masqueraders. But the strangest of all the masqueraders is Bette. In almost every interview she has given, Bette has lied about herself. She has painted herself to the world and to her fans as a completely selfish person; a hard-boiled soulless young vixen without family ties, without any real loyalty to her husband, a woman who'd trample on everyone and everything to become a success.

"I am hard-boiled," she has said. "I am ruthless. I am not in human bondage to anyone or anything except myself. I am a completely selfish person."

Never will you get the truth about Bette from Bette herself. So this picture must be drawn from what I actually know about Bette and what I have gathered from the people who know her best.

The day I first met her, she was making personal appearances in New York, right after she had played with George Arliss in "The Man Who Played God." I waited for her downstairs in the lobby of the theatre, hoping for an interview.

Suddenly a man, obviously drunk, a shabby, disreputable looking creature, approached the doorman and said that he wanted to see Bette, that they had once been in the same show together.

The doorman went into a little side room to 'phone up to her dressing-room and he came back and said, as though he could hardly believe the words he himself was speaking, "Miss Davis will see you right away."

He turned to me and, looking bewildered, he said, "Gee, I don't know what she wants to see him for. I told her that he was drunk and that he just wanted to make a touch."

So I wasn't very much impressed when several years later, she gave out an interview in which she said, "I have no sort of use for the under-dog. Women never have. They never 'mother' the under- (Continued on page 100)

Bette and Hubby Harmon Nelson do a little stepping out. Cruel gossips have whispered that every time he buys her a corsage he uses her money to pay for it. Nothing infuriates Bette more, she violently declares, because it isn't true.

Bette's young sister, Barbara, was the reason why Bette stayed at one studio even though she felt it might cost her her entire picture career. At the time it meant money, however, and money was badly needed in the Davis household.

CLOSE-UP OF A COMER

JANE BRYAN KNOWS WHAT SHE WANTS AND SHE'S NOT LETTING ANYTHING STOP HER FROM GETTING IT, NOW THAT SHE'S HEADED IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION

BY SONIA LEE

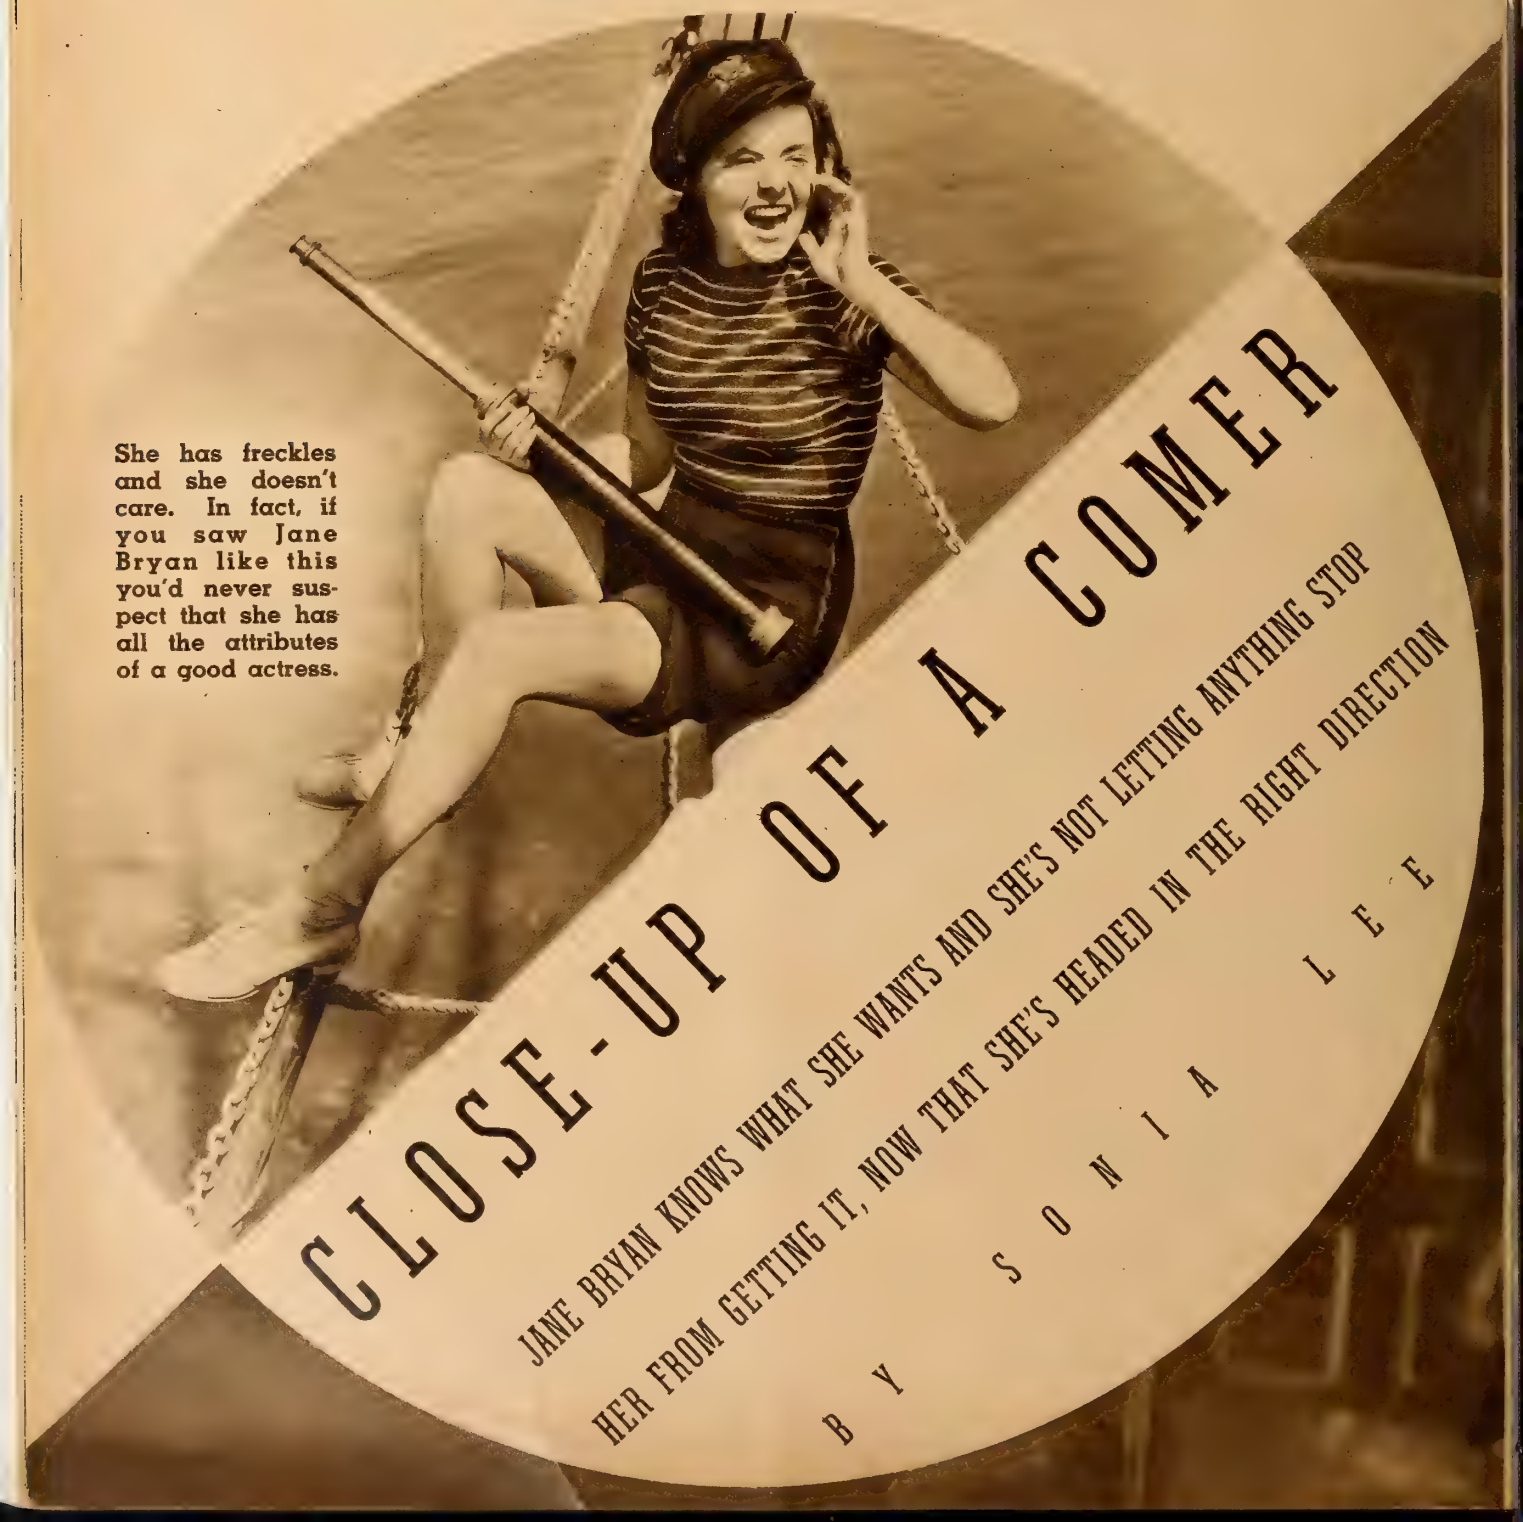
THERE WAS considerable commotion in the O'Brien household. Jane was missing again!

While her mother was frantically searching for the strayling in clothes closets, hidden nooks and under the rear porch steps, the two-year-old Jane was giving her first dramatic performance in the gloom-laden secrecy of the attic.

In the audience was her amiable teddy bear, sitting all attention, her vacuous-eyed rag doll, and the incessantly approving papier-mache duck, whose hinged neck bobbed up and down to every vibration. Jane's appreciative audience was drafted into the cast when the dramas of derring-do demanded it. After her plays, Jane always had an elaborate tea party for the cast.

You know that child today as Jane Bryan, a girl who, without professional experience and little training, has in something less than two years, been certified for screen stardom.

By classic standards, Jane Bryan is not beautiful. But she fulfills the modern idea that the first requisite of beauty is an electric, vital emotionalism mirrored in a mobile face. Jane is the American ideal—sweetness and strength; a dreaming quality combined with an understanding of reality, a fine hopefulness, youthful sincerity, a bubbling, overwhelming aliveness.



A very young nineteen she is, in her blazing enthusiasms and sudden descents to despondency.

"I am either frightfully happy or frightfully unhappy," she confesses over the luncheon table. "Do you think I'll ever find a middle ground?" she asks wistfully.

She is as alive, as refreshing as a tumbling brook with the noon sun shimmering in its folds. There is not one atom of sophistication in her system.

Her hair is wind swept; her face generously peppered with little girl freckles; her mouth is wide and sweet and parts often in laughter over strong, white, even teeth. Her clear, straightforward eyes, under their sensible eye-brows, have humor and seriousness in them.

Neither inherited nor cultivated are her dramatic talents. They are instinctive with her. (Continued on page 120)

She has freckles and she doesn't care. In fact, if you saw Jane Bryan like this you'd never suspect that she has all the attributes of a good actress.

Though she specifies "no love, please," either in her pictures or her personal life, Jane goes places and has fun with Phil Kellogg, a cutter at her studio.

"Watch her, she's going places," Bette Davis has said of Jane. Here, Bette assists with a bit of make-up.

At the age of two, Jane began her dramatic career in the secrecy of the attic. After the show there was always tea.

HOLLYWOOD HUSBAND

HERE IS THE TRUE LOVE STORY OF A STAR YOU ALL KNOW, WHOSE MARRIAGE MIGHT EASILY GO ON THE ROCKS. DO YOU KNOW A WAY TO SAVE IT?

When the star arrived in New York, she was surrounded by reporters while I, her husband, was left unnoticed in the background.

The fact that I was watching didn't embarrass my wife in the least when she was making a love scene for a picture.

I'LL CALL myself John Murdock. If I were to tell you my real name, chances are you wouldn't know it anyway. Nor are you likely to remember my face. It got into the papers exactly once, the first time I flew to Hollywood to visit my famous wife.

My wife's name isn't Mona Carne, but I'll call her that. You all know her. You've waited for her latest picture to open in your theatre. You've thrilled to her dark beauty. You've wept with her, laughed at her madcap escapades. Perhaps you've envied her, thinking, "She's so radiant. She must have happiness as well as success. She must have love!" If you're a bachelor, I'm sure you've also envied me.

If you have, it's a sorry joke. Because the lovely girl of the screen is not a very happy woman. Nor am I a happy man. Our marriage has, through no fault of hers, through no fault of mine, reached a crisis. We're still crazy about each other—yet it doesn't seem we can go on.

Does that sound strange? Well, ours is a strange story. Maybe it's just that a star shouldn't try marriage with a man outside the picture business. It isn't only that three thousand miles lie between where her work is, and where mine ought to be. There's the huge difference in income, in mode of life.

I'm a physician, you see. My life belongs to science more wholly than it can ever belong to a loved woman. If I compromise with my work, the price is self-respect.

It wasn't like this I dreamed my marriage would turn out! Through the years of medical school and interneship, I thought of Mona as the fragile girl next door, ripening into the wife whom some day I would cherish.

Mona and I have always known each other. Dad was the Carne's family physician, and often, when she was still a spindly-legged little girl, I remember her rushing into his office. "Uncle Murdock, please do something for my sniffles."

Sometimes I was the one to do the doctoring. I was in medical school when Mona was fourteen, and the difference in our ages—eight years—seemed enormous then. I was, she said, her grown-uppest friend. She'd come to me with her troubles.

In the course of time her problems became boys. "Dick Smith tried to kiss me. I shouldn't let him, should I?" It was a shock, my little Mona (Continued on page 108)

TAKE IT FROM JIMMY STEWART, WHO KNOWS—THE PROBLEMS OF BACHELORHOOD ARE PLENTY AND HE TELLS YOU WHY

IT'S TOUGH TO BE SINGLE

BY CAROLINE S. HOYT

WELL, I'LL tell you," said Jimmy, his sad voice sadder than usual, "Daisy said to me this morning, she said, 'You're very hard to cook for, Mister Jimmy,' and that's what I mean about inconveniences. If I had a wife, now, she could cope with Daisy.

"Daisy," continued Jimmy, "is our cook."

I was conscious of a pang of disappointment. I had hoped, not unreasonably, that Daisy would prove to be a romance, perhaps one of those sirens who ensnare the feet of the unwary bachelor.

But Jimmy said no. Jimmy, it may lighten the hearts of sub-deb America to know, is not in love. Jimmy is not contemplating matrimony. Jimmy is not involved. He is heartwhole, fancy free and both feet loose, despite the newspaper rumors linking his name with Rosalind Russell, the shadow of the altar in the foreground. Jimmy was polite but firm. He is not, he insists, altar-bound. Still, there are those about town who insist that the glittering new sparkler Roz sports on the important finger is a gift from Jimmy.

"Daisy," continued Jimmy, "cooks for me and for John Swope and for Josh Logan, in our place in Brentwood. She also cleans the house and picks up our clothes which we always just step out of and leave lay. She does our laundry, answers our phones, sends our clothes to the cleaners, makes our beds. In fact, Daisy does everything for me except act my parts in pictures. She may be doing that before long.

"The reason Daisy said I was hard to cook for was because I complained about a salad. Now it was a nice enough salad; it is a nice enough salad, I should say, for if you think I'm not going to keep on getting it, you don't know Daisy as I know Daisy. It's a very nice salad, sort of complicated and incognito and all that. But I don't like to have the same salad every day no matter how worthwhile it may be. And I told her so. I kind of yelled, I guess. We all yell at Daisy, all the time, about everything. And she looked very superior and said that she had made this salad for years for the best people and that the best people write her fan letters about the salad and ask her for the recipe and all, and that she gets many more fan letters, she'd like me to know, than she's ever noticed me getting. And that they all say that their lives are not worth living since Daisy and her salad have gone away, and that there is more genuwine emotion in her fan letters, she'd like me to know, than she's ever noticed in my fan mail or in the fan mail of anyone like me.

"And when I yelled, 'I still don't like it!' well, it was then that Daisy said grimly, 'you are very hard to cook for' and went out, slamming the door behind her and muttering that she wasn't interested in going into the matter any further.

SO YOU see," said Jimmy, almost apologetically, "the inconveniences of being a bachelor are not what you might expect, not all about girls and dates and all. Most of the girls I take out, like Roz and Sonja Henie and Ginger and one or two others are in pictures, too. And they know how it is if I have to call off a date at the last minute or ask for a date at the last minute. For the past four months I haven't had any conveniences or inconveniences about what to do with my spare time because I've always known what I'd do, work. I've been doing "Benefits Forgot" (I consider it the best part I've had since I came to Hollywood) and I've been doing radio, which is exciting to me and now I'm working in "Vivacious Lady" with Ginger and, well, I haven't even had time to make a date, let alone break one. I haven't even had time to get my hair cut, which you may notice from the kind of Byronic effect I'm sporting. How d'you think I'd look with braids? I certainly haven't had time to think of getting married because you have to have time to fall in love first, and I tell you, if there's any convenience at all to being a bachelor it's that you don't have to worry or think up apologetic speeches when you have to work late every night for weeks. All I have to do is call Roz or Ginger or Sonja and say 'Look, I'm working tonight' and they answer, 'Okay, I know how 'tis' and that's that.

"Yep, the inconveniences of being a bachelor are certanly manifold, but of these (Continued on page 86)

WHAT HAVE THEY— THAT YOU HAVEN'T?

BY KAREN HOLLIS

Directors called Roz a blue-blooded clam and tried to shy clear of her. Could you take that?

IT ISN'T fair," you may have told yourself a dozen times as you watched Bette Davis on the screen, holding an audience in breathless admiration. "I could do that." Or it may have been tales of Carole Lombard's fabulous jewels that got you down, or the assurance of your best beau that you are cuter than Simone Simon. Your mirror may, with entire truth, tell you that you are just as limpidly beautiful as Virginia Bruce. Then why are you lagging behind while these girls have all the glory and the fun?

Bette's hit pictures follow each other in dizzy succession. While the giddy nonsense of "It's Love I'm After" is still ringing in your ears, you'll see what a tornado she is in "Jezebel." Any newcomer, however brilliant, would have a hard time catching up with Bette.

Carole Lombard is the box-office darling of the year. "Nothing Sacred" and "True Confession" having cheered multitudes and strained the box-office cash registers. And soon you will see her romping merrily through "Food For Scandal" with the French challenger, Fernand Gravet. As if that weren't enough to fill any girl's life, she has to go and captivate Clark Gable, too.

Simone Simon won the admiration of those supposedly hard-boiled feuders, Winchell and Bernie, while they were making "Love and Hisses" and the best talents on the

THEY HAVE BEAUTY, BRAINS

Virginia Bruce was relegated to the "beautiful but dumb" class, but refused to stay there.

Carole Lombard spent months in a hospital, but learned a valuable lesson there.

When the hammer-throwing brigade began on Simone Simon, it took courage to face it. What of yours?

20th Century-Fox lot are engaged in giving her all the breaks in "Josette." She doesn't sit around home lonely of an evening, either.

Virginia Bruce stepped from the last scene of "Bad Man of Brimstone" into marriage to Walter Rubin who adores her, and Rosalind Russell, having shown that she could hold her own even with Myrna Loy in the cast of "Man Proof," visited the home folks back East and caused no end of damage to men's hearts in the select social circles into which she was born.

These girls are enjoying success in pictures and all the prerequisites that follow in its trail—deferential friends, rare jewels and furs, opportunity to travel and meet interesting people, boxes at Santa Anita, the love of the one man of their choice, or of many. They have all the luck. But do they?

If you will follow me in a game of truth that is going to be pretty uncomfortable some of the time, I am sure we can find out why these girls are in the money and the limelight while you are—just where?

When mama told you to practise on the piano for a whole hour, did you kill time pretending to look for your music, drum aimlessly away on last week's lesson instead of struggling with today's, and then move the hands of the clock ahead? When you finished school did you heave a sigh of relief that that was over at last? When you have set aside an evening for altering a dress, or doing posture exercises, or brushing up on typing speed tests, do you do it right then, or do you put it off until tomorrow if the boy next door asks you to go to the movies?

DON'T TELL ME; I fear the very worst. And I am going to be very cruel and tell you that all the luck in Hollywood couldn't make you a success in pictures if you haven't the stamina to concentrate on your own development, no matter how many times the phone rings, or who is determined to get a crowd together for a party.

When Virginia Bruce went to New York to be a featured show girl after playing small parts in several pictures, she could have been the belle of the night clubs. Invitations poured in. But Virginia figured it was time for a turning point in her career, and she wanted to be ready for it by filling in gaps in her education. She had always done well in English and history in high school back in Fargo, North Dakota, but started working in pictures before college courses for which she had registered in Los Angeles began. So, instead of going to parties, she sat in her hotel room at night and read the plays of Eugene O'Neill, seeking to figure out why he was such an important influence in the modern theatre. Then she delved into theatrical history, reading all the old plays of Sheridan and Congreve. The moment she could afford them, she took music and diction and dancing lessons. With no one but herself to care if she practised regularly, either.

Bette Davis helped pay her way through school by waiting on tables, and had to do her studying at odd hours. Later when she was making the dreary rounds of managers' offices in New York, friends insisted that she needed some diversion and begged her to go out nights. If a worthwhile play was suggested, Bette went, but if it were just dinner and dancing and fun, she stayed home. She read dozens of plays, learned parts that she never expected to play. She was just sharpening up her tools for the jobs she would have some day.

Rosalind Russell has perhaps the most thorough educational background of any girl in pictures. She has travelled a lot, associated with cultured people all her life, vied with six lively brothers and sisters in every competitive sport. Theology was her major interest at Marymount; journalism, chemistry and French were attacked with gusto when she was at Barnard. She followed this with courses in stagecraft and acting and diction in dramatic school, but she still figures she has a lot to learn. She digs into any books that she thinks will help her today, not tomorrow.

Maybe you are hooting now at the suspicion that I am going to tell you Simone Simon is the studious type. Well, she isn't in the ordinary sense, but she (Continued on page 96)

BOB SPEAKS UP

AND TELLS ALL ABOUT THAT MUCH PUBLICIZED CHIP ON HIS SHOULDER

BY FRANC DILLON

TALL, STRAIGHT as an arrow, with brown hair and eyes, Robert Kent is a little more than just good-looking. There is a boyish quality about him that makes him seem less than his twenty-odd years, and his frankness and cordial manner contradict his confession that he sometimes has been guilty of carrying a chip on his shoulder.

There never was an actor who didn't honestly believe he had something to "grouse" about, and Bob is no exception. He thinks he made too many movies during the past twelve months. "People will get tired of my face," he fears. He had little time to rest between pictures and was tired out and just recovering from influenza.

"I couldn't even have the 'flu' in comfort," he complained, "because I was in the middle of a picture and had to get back to work in order not to hold up production." And it was a fact that for a few days they were virtually holding him up, he was so weak, in order to get him through the film.

Bob was born Douglas Blackley. His father was a Scotch-Canadian wall-paper manufacturer, who died when little Douglas was six years old. In order to support her son, Mrs. Blackley secured a secretarial position. She put Douglas in the best schools, but he never stayed long in any one. The curriculum demanded too much history and algebra, and didn't devote enough time to drama to suit Douglas, who, at an early age, showed a decided preference for that subject; and so it happened that sometimes he was expelled, and other times he got the idea of leaving first—and did.

"Douglas never wanted to do things exactly the way he was told," his mother says, which may account for the fact that he often says "no" when he might say "yes," if he didn't think he was being pushed around. As one friend of his describes it, "he puts up his elbow to ward off a blow before the other (Continued on page 70)

NOT SO DUMB

BY MARTHA KERR

BEAUTIFUL MARY KNOWS THE ANSWERS WHEN IT COMES TO LOOKING OUT FOR LITTLE CARLISLE

The producers tell the directors, but Mary tells the producers—and gets away with it.

Johnny Downs is Mary's beau these days. They're as inseparable as ham and eggs.

SHE LOOKS like a mischievous angel," said Carl Laemmle, Jr., when he saw Mary Carlisle lunching with her uncle.

"I'll call someone else to talk money with you," said William Le Baron of Paramount. "You'll be too tough for me to handle."

Somewhere between those two statements lies the reason for Mary Carlisle, movie actress. She got in, like so many others, on the strength of her pretty face. Unlike so many others, she stayed in, on the strength of more than prettiness.

Mary got her first break, but followed it up with no smashing hit to establish her snugly in the minds of producers and fans. No one was interested in furthering her career, not even an agent. She was backed only by herself and her own good sense. And it's the latter commodity, even more than her blonde beauty, which has lifted her from the also-ran class to a frontline place among Paramount's comers.

A little over five feet, with cornflower eyes, a beguiling smile and hair the color of ripe wheat, she looks like the kind of girl who has only to lift her lashes in a certain way, and the world is hers. Physically, Mary Carlisle might pose as a princess, but she's a child of the twentieth century and not of a fairytale. She does lift her lashes—and her eyes are not soft with appeal, but bright with purpose. She does smile like an innocent, but the corners of her mouth curve in mockery of her own demureness. She is a beautiful blue-eyed blonde, but she isn't dumb.

"Maybe I was when I started," she said, then, lips still parted, brought her small fist thumping down on the table. "No!" Though her eyes were alight with laughter, her mouth was firm. "I think it's just as silly to run yourself down as to brag. If I'd been dumb then, I'd probably still be dumb. But I was fourteen and going to school and having fun and not giving much of a darn about anything else."

That was when Carl Laemmle saw her and sent his secretary over to summon her to his office. "Shall I go?" she breathed to her mother. "Of course, go." She appeared on the threshold, a "mischievous angel" of fourteen, with most of the mischief wiped from her face by awe. Conrad Veidt was there and they were all talking German, and she didn't understand a word they said. But it was in English that Laemmle finally told her he wanted to make a test of her with Veidt.

So what did she do? Spoiled her chances, as any three smart girls of her age might have done. "I tried to turn myself into a glamor girl, and made a fool of myself instead." She bought herself a pair of high-heeled shoes and a dress ten years too old for her. She had her nails stained a shrieking red and her softly waved hair shellacked into a permanent. She presented herself, teetering as if on stilts, tripping over a skirt she couldn't manage, on her face a smile of haughty unconcern, as becomes a movie star. "They were kind enough not to laugh outright. Still, I'd rather draw a quick curtain over the rest."

BUT SHE'D tasted blood, and what started as an accident developed into a firm resolve. At sixteen she put childish things behind her and went to an uncle who worked at Metro. "All my uncles seem to have worked at studios. But that doesn't (Continued on page 68)

TRICKS OF THE BEAUTY GAME

COMES THIS month, ladies, a miscellaneous bunch of beauty data which doesn't sit so hot under any particular title. However, the above label will do as well as any to hold together this issue's collection of do's and don'ts, stunts, tips and trick plays in the beauty game. Dear me, suz, I have so much to tell you, I dunno exactly where to start. I guess I'll pitch right into figures—that's always a good beginning.

A friend of mine just lost an unnecessary ten pounds in a month by going without lunch every day. She's a working girl, and she said that she had been in the habit of going out to lunch with other girls in the office, and just because they ate hearty lunches, she ate, too. Often ate much more than she wanted. However, she said she did eat a hearty breakfast and a bang-up dinner. Breakfast always consisted of fruit, two eggs, toast and coffee.

I know that when I was an office slave, I used to consume what amounted to two dinners every day, just because it was pleasant to eat and chat with a co-worker. Since I've been slaving at home, I find that a bowl of soup or a piece of fruit is all I require. This advice, of course, is only for overweights. Underweights, go right on eating substantial lunches.

And speaking of underweights, I was wondering if this advice, which doctors give for children who are picky about their food, might not work for thin people in general. That's the advice about "miniature meals." You thin people so often have capricious appetites, maybe this would work. Have a very little to eat—very often. You might actually measure the quantities you serve yourself, keep a chart on your progress, and blow yourself to something elegant when you've achieved a woman-size dinner. Start out with two teaspoons of cereal for breakfast, and try to work up to three tablespoons. Take a quarter of a can of cream soup for lunch, and work up to a whole can. And so on.

Then, too, there are the thin folks who eat like lumberjacks and, as they so often tell their friends, "don't gain an ounce, my dear!" Did you ever try lying down on the sofa with a hot water bottle on your stomach immediately after a meal? You feel rather silly, but it's a helpful poundage-gainer.

To return to overweights—married overweights who do their own housework. It has been said time and again that housework won't reduce you, but, by golly, I lost twelve pounds in about six weeks, and I can't think what else did it. I was pinched for time, and I know that millions of other housefraus are pinched for time, too—so much so that they feel they can't spare twenty minutes for formal exercise, nor do they feel like coping with a special diet for themselves when they have the whole bloomin' family to cook for. Perhaps it's a makeshift way of doing things, but who cares, so long as you get results.

There's a trick to Madeleine Carroll's good hair-grooming—and it's easy to learn.

If you will work at it, your figure can approach the beauty of Jean Parker's.

When I began to notice that the tweed number was getting slack around waist and hips, I decided to make a real exercise routine out of the bed-making and so on. How? Well, first place, no time out for a cigarette, a phone call, or an additional cup of coffee until your work is done. Second place, consciously hold your stomach muscles as tense as you can the whole time. Third place, keep your knees stiff every time you bend over—and the feet shouldn't be more than eight inches apart either. When you reach up to put things on shelves, take a second to reach for a point just a bit too high for you to touch —that's fine for slimming the waist.

IT'S KELLY TO YOU!

BY NANETTE KUTNER

While Cary Grant was making "Topper," Patsy visited the set. It was Laugh Day for the cast!

At nine, Patsy Kelly proved to be the most promising kid in Jack Blue's Dancing School.

THE WAITER brought a bottle of chili sauce and set it down, next to her dish of scrambled eggs.

"I could marry you for that," said Patsy Kelly.

An hour later, upon being introduced, a reporter, from the dignified New York Times, declared she was his favorite comedienne.

"I could marry you for that," repeated Miss Kelly.

And when I asked whether, now that she is in the big money bracket, she intends building a California house and swimming pool, she exclaimed, "I haven't that much conceit!"

She means it.

Since she commenced working, at sixteen, Patsy Kelly has never been without a job, nor has she looked for one. Mentally knocking wood, she says that, up-to-date, hers has been a charmed existence. An Irish disposition, naturally superstitious, makes her positive this good luck will end. Should such an unfortunate day arrive, it will not catch Miss Kelly unawares.

She said, "I've just signed a new long-term contract with Hal Roach. But what's a Hollywood contract? I can get fired, then what? Suppose my house were only half built? I'd have to marry the contractor to pay for it!"

That gives you a rough idea. For a word portrait of Patsy Kelly must be rough, drawn in thick crayon-like sentences, a caricature outline. She is a live cartoon, definitely slapstick. A dizzy wave of one hand, a round-shouldered lunge, a devastating remark, and she turns anybody's preconceived notion of a screen star into riotous burlesque.

The representative from her studio, sent to preserve caution, sat, stunned into submission. What good was his gentle negative nod, his frantic, pleading eyes? What good against Miss Kelly's corned-beef-and-cabbage honesty?

"I'm not going to be caught off guard," she announced. "Only last night I ate spaghetti in the company of a real princess. I nearly died until I saw she was having a hard time balancing it, too." Came a Kelly after-thought. "Remind me, tomorrow I got to get etiquette."

Having finished her eggs, she strolled across the room. She wore high-heeled pumps. They looked odd accompanied by bare legs. She had (Continued on page 106)

LUCKY PHYLLIS WELCH IS LEAD FOR HAROLD LLOYD

Phyllis is set for "Professor, Beware!" She went through a rigid test before being accepted. 1. Phil undergoes scrutiny of Cameraman Archie Stout. 2. Choosing hat for test. 3. Being fitted. 4. Ready for the camera. 5. The "take" is recorded. 6. With Lloyd on location, having triumphed.

The younger set in Hollywood are Big Apple mad, even as you and I. Here Jon Hall and Bobby Clark pause to catch their breath.

Those newlyweds, Jackie Coogan and Betty Grable are right out in front when it comes to fancy stepping.

No doubt about it, the Big Apple is strenuous! Jean Parker takes time out to fa' down after a session of rug cutting.

THE BIG APPLE

This may look complicated but if you know your Big Apple as Jon Hall, Alexander Darcy and Pat Wilder do, it's a cinch!

Not exactly a step to try in public, but it's fun, Wendy Barrie and Alexander Darcy claim.

Patricia Wilder and Alexander Darcy exhibit another variation, which takes plenty of pep.

Lana Turner and Milton Berle go into a bit of truckin', part of the fun when you do the Big Apple.

PLAYING

PROBABLY more money changes hands during the racing season at Santa Anita than on the stock market during a similar period of time. From Christmas day to Easter, Santa Anita stays open and everybody in Hollywood and points East suddenly goes into the matter of horse racing very thoroughly.

The track itself, built flush up against the Pasadena Mountains, is probably one of the most beautiful in the world. But it is more than beautiful . . . it has glamor. For it is there that the movie stars gather in droves, whether they know anything about horses or not. Carole Lombard and Claudette Colbert and Myrna Loy and Bette Davis turn out in their smartest creations. They are much more particular about what they wear at Santa Anita than at the Troc or any other night spot in Hollywood. For Santa Anita is also the gathering place of Society with a capital S. Whitneys and Vanderbilts and Hitchcocks pop out of every nook and corner, since they all have stables and since their horses all race.

The movie stars own horses, too. Bing Crosby has quite a string, though they are known as losers, and Bob Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck have their own stables, too. So has Clark Gable.

Playing the horses has become Number 1 sport in Hollywood. There seems to be something in the atmosphere that makes laying a two-dollar place parlay imperative. Even school children catch the gambling spirit during the racing season and some of the picture colony's children make ten dollar bets more calmly than you would split a two dollar show ticket on a one to ten shot.

Among the stars, Al Jolson and Ben Bernie are the heaviest bettors—and the most nonchalant losers. Al has been known to place a seventy-five thousand dollar bet and turn his back on the race to discuss the weather

HOW TO WIN

Bing Crosby, whose horses never come in first, has, what he considers a system for winning. First pick a good horse, not one of his. Always wear a smile to throw off bad luck. Always look worried when asked about your horse's chances. Never shut your eyes at the finish.

THE HOSSES!

with an acquaintance. And Ben Bernie drops five thousand dollars on a loser without flickering an eyelash. As a matter of fact, many a wailing secretary in Hollywood couldn't get a five dollar raise if her widowed mother were starving, but her boss probably loses many times her salary every day in the week at Santa Anita.

This particular track however, is considered to be one of the squarest tracks in America. Of course, there is undoubtedly a small coefficient of dishonesty. Horses are occasionally found doped, odds on horses are pulled, awaiting more favorable odds and owners don't always try, but generally speaking, almost every race is really a true race. Chiselers find it hard to make the long trek to California which accounts for the lack of the usual racetrack touts found everywhere else in the country.

Hollywood women are pretty passionate racing enthusiasts but they are, by instinct, a lot more conservative than their husbands or their best beaux. Connie and Joan Bennett are the most sporting of the lot and will bet a fifty dollar bill when something looks good, but the average glamor girl is content with a two or five dollar ticket. Neither Mae West nor Greta Garbo have ever been known to appear at the track and neither of them play the horses. Aside from these two, however, every big name in Hollywood shows up at one time or another at Santa Anita.

Telephone bills ride sky high while the season is in full swing. Employees, from writers down, who can't get to the track, spend half their time at the phone calling for results. Bookies roam the various lots and find plenty of eager prospects, despite the efforts that are made to keep them outside the gates. In fact, when the horses come to town, everybody who is anybody in Hollywood, leaves town. And it would seem that all roads lead to Santa Anita.

HOW TO LOSE

George Raft has different ideas. He tips on how to lose every time. Pick any horse. Always look happy while they're waiting at the post. Always watch some other horse after the start, thus saving the agony of watching your own. When it's over, keep your chin up.

1—Thomas Beck and Marjorie Weaver show how it's done. This kiss is taboo 'cause he's looking down at her.

2—When kissing in the movies, you have to think of camera angles. No fun.

3—This is okay. A gal can kiss down at a man any old time she likes.

4—Here is a posed kiss. Not spontaneous, but more attractive than the real thing.

5—Now this is a natural kiss, making both Tom and Marge look pretty awkward.

6—Oh, Mr. Beck, stop! It's against the rules to kiss down at a girl.

7—No hesitation stuff. Mr. Hays insists you have to go right through with it.

8—The ideal movie kiss is on horseback. Marjorie and Tom try to give you an idea.

9—This isn't in the rules, but for privacy out in public, it does the trick.

Nothing like a ranch to take your mind off your work, Hugh Herbert believes. Of course, it's work, running a ranch, as you can see.

An over-sized lily pond in the living room is just the thing for ranches. And it's deep enough for practical purposes when unwelcome guests arrive.

GETTING AWAY FROM IT ALL

If a man's best friend is his dog, Hugh believes in making it go double. Here he is surrounded by friends.

If you find you suddenly need a manicure, why wear yourself out with a file is what Hugh would like to know. There's the garden shears!

Can Hughie sing? Well, you should hear him! Even the coyotes out around his ranch join in the chorus when he feels an attack of melody coming on.

There's so much to do around the place, complains Hugh, that he has to write it all down or he'll forget. What about the chickens? Have they been fed?

Monarch of all he surveys! With scenery like this, is it any wonder that Hugh likes to spend all his free time on the ranch? Such inspiration!

Hugh grabs himself a cat nap. This business of relaxing is too strenuous for him. Looks like he should hie himself back to the studio to rest up.

ROBERT TAYLOR TAKES TO WORK AND DANIELLE DARRIEUX RESTS

Robert Taylor claims he's a "slow study" so he's taking no chances with the script of "Three Comrades." In it he has a he-man role with opportunity to prove himself an actor rather than just a handsome man. If that recent unfair "Beautiful Bob" publicity has done this it proves even a knock can give a boost.

With troupers like Bob Young and Margaret Sullavan in "Three Comrades," Bob must be on his toes. Weeks before production, he rehearsed on the quiet and during the actual shooting was on the sidelines whenever he wasn't in a scene in order to learn any tricks of the trade that he may have missed.

AS OUR CAMERAMAN CATCHES THEM UNAWARES

Danielle Darrieux soaks up some California sunshine while waiting for her first American picture, "The Rage of Paris." This 21-year-old was not only the rage of Paris but the entire continent when J. Cheever Cowdin, Universal executive, signed her, while touring Europe, to a contract guaranteeing her a million dollars. American audiences took her to their hearts in "Mayerling," the French picture with Charles Boyer, which won the critics' award. Her husband, Henri Decoin, is a noted writer and director and their romance started on the set.

STEPPING OUT

Those heavy "dates," Mr. Wayne Morris and Priscilla Lane, are still at it!

The Tony Martins (she's Alice Faye y'know) out to confound the "rift" rumors.

Now who says you can't stay married in Hollywood? The Darryl Zanucks celebrate their fourteenth anniversary.

Douglas Fairbanks escorts Norma Shearer to a preview, but Ty Power landed the role in "Marie Antoinette."

Those Don Ameches, truly the town's happiest wedded, take in the "In Old Chicago" preview.

Here you have real romance! Phyllis Brooks and Cary Grant, dancing toward the altar, their friends say.

Joan Blondell and her Dick Powell are stepping out as often as possible before the stork arrives in June.

GOOD

Lili Damita sports a hat Hubby Errol Flynn gave her as a birthday present.

Now it's Margaret Lindsay's turn to step out with Alfred G. Vanderbilt.

Mr. and Mrs. Eddie Robinson seem in high good humor on their way to the tennis.

BY LEO TOWNSEND

Fred MacMurray has been in many a tough spot in pictures, but he never experienced anything like the awful hour he spent on the Paramount lot the other day. He was seen with a Pomeranian! Tried to explain it away by saying he was watching it for a friend, but there was no conviction in his voice. Turned out he had bought it himself, as a gift to Mrs. MacM., who likes Pomeranians.

Proud Papa

Reporters have finally discovered a way to get the usually reticent Gary Cooper to talk. All you have to do is ask after his daughter. Gary, who seldom discusses women, can tell you the weight, height and disposition of this young lady, as well as furnish interesting highlights of her brief but apparently eventful life. The young lady's name, in case you don't know, is Veronica Maria. She's named after her mother, who was Veronica Balfe before she changed her name to Sandra Shaw for picture purposes.

A literal minded fan recently wrote to ask if "True Confession" were really the true life story of Carole Lombard. The answer is No. Miss Lombard, unlike Emile Zola and the U. S. Navy, has never had her personal history immortalized on celluloid. However, it's not a bad idea. You'd have a very swell comedy drama, and just look at the cast. Very few gals have Bill Powell and Clark Gable for leading men.

Lombard Preferred

Speaking of Miss L. reminds us of the writer who was being interviewed for a success story. "If you had your choice," asked the interviewer, "where would you prefer to live?" Said the guy: "At Carole Lombard's house."

Sylvia Sidney is one young lady who likes Hollywood only for practical purposes. She likes the work, and the cash involved, and she thinks it's a nice place to visit, but she prefers to live in the East. She prefers it so much that she has just bought a 13-room farmhouse in New Jersey, near the Lindbergh estate, and the minute she finishes a picture she rushes back to the farm.

NEWS

Dark glasses 'n'all, we know you Cary Grant. And that's Phyllis Brooks.

Some hat Dolores Del Rio's sporting! But Connie Bennett's is staid.

Meet Mr. Shane

Twenty years ago neither Wayne Morris nor "Bei Mir Bist Du Schoen" imagined that one day their careers would merge. But when the modernized chant became an overnight hit Warners bought it for "Love, Honor and Behave," and in the picture Priscilla Lane sings it to Morris. Incidentally, it's the toughest song title of all time, according to music publishers, who get orders from dealers with weird conceptions of its name. Most popular right now are "My Mere Bits of Shame" and "Buy a Beer, Mr. Shane." Mr. Shane, meet Mr. Morris.

Inveterate followers—and even a few of the veterate ones—of the doings of Shirley Temple will be happy to know that she is now a cop. The Los Angeles chief of police managed somehow to take a moment off from his relentless drive on local vice to confer an honorary badge on little Shirley. It's a miniature of the regulation badge, and it has a diamond in the center. So Shirley is now a Junior Policewoman, and the chief of police has gone back to work. Incidentally, little Miss Temple is as proud of her new badge as she is over being such an important movie star, believe it or not!

Love's Triumph

Phyllis Brooks had planned for weeks on a vacation trip to New York with Claire Trevor. Day before they were to leave she discovered that Cary Grant's birthday would arrive during the time she planned to be away. Love's triumph was New York's loss, or something, and Phyllis cancelled her trip to stay home and welcome in a new milestone with Mr. G.

While she was in Chicago visiting her htisband recently, Dorothy Lamour tossed a luncheon party for a group of elevator operators from Marshall Field's. Reason is that Dorothy once ran an elevator at the department store herself, before she got a job singing with Herbie Kay's orchestra. Dorothy reports she liked Chicago immensely. Had a nice visit with her husband, and was pleased to note that nobody in Chicago goes about in a sarong.

Phrase Twister

Greatest phrase twister in Hollywood is Director Michael Curtiz, whose eccentricities of speech make Sam Goldwyn sound like an Oxford professor in comparison. Almost everyone has heard his famous crack at a prop boy who brought him an object he didn't want. "If I have to send someone so dumb," said Mike, "I go myself." And for a scene in a recent picture he wanted a horse without a rider. So he ordered "an empty horse." And a few weeks ago a visitor on the "Robin Hood" set was introduced to Curtiz by Errol Flynn. The visitor arose from his chair to shake hands. "Sit down," said Mike, "Don't relax."

In a scene for "Jezebel," Eddie Anderson is supposed to row Bette Davis through a swamp. Before they shot the scene, Bette looked doubtfully at the aged rowboat and turned to Anderson. "Can you row a boat?" she asked him. "Well," said Anderson, "I played 'Noah' in 'The Green Pastures'."

Debonaire as ever, Doug Fairbanks steps out with the Fred Astaires.

We think Freddie Bartholomew and Olivia De Havilland look alike. Do you?

Pat Paterson gets practice talking French with Charles Boyer and Danielle Darrieux.

No Blind Dates

While on location for "Test Pilot" Spencer Tracy was approached by a young lady who wanted his autograph. Spence was all set to sign when he took a second glance at the piece of paper the gal handed him. It read: "I'll meet you at nine." Mr. T., who doesn't meet strange women at nine, refused to sign. The girl was pretty mad about the whole thing and flounced off in a huff muttering things while Spencer could only shrug and feel uncomfortable.

This should be a lesson to young gals who are silly rather than sentimental. Speaking of this famous star—as almost everyone is these days: It must be love at Spencer Tracy's house. At Santa Anita a few days ago, Mrs. T. was busily picking Spencer's horses for him.

This could happen only in Hollywood. Benny Baker's agent, who was once the fiance of Baker's wife, is negotiating with director Bill Wellman for a part in "Men With Wings." Wellman was once Mrs. Baker's husband.

Alligators Before Stars

On the set of "Her Jungle Love" at Paramount, they have a large pool of water filled with alligators. Dorothy Lamour, Ray Milland and several Malayan extras were drifting on a raft in the pool one day when some visitors dropped in. They spotted a couple of swarthy men in swimming trunks on the banks and asked the director in scared whispers if they were there to prevent fatalities should the raft capsize. "Oh, no," said the director, "in case the raft tips it's the job of those men to watch the alligators. They're very valuable." Needless to say, the visitors were left quite speechless.

Carole Lombard arrived at the commissary at M-G-M the other day to lunch with Clark Gable. She was wearing an unbecoming, if not an atrocious, hat. "We've just had a fight," she explained, "and I always wear this hat until we make up."

They've Parted

Gene Markey and Simone Simon have come to the parting of the ways —and Gene's way may lead to New York where Gloria Swanson is going to make her home. For the time being David Niven is at the receiving end of the Simone smiles.

Deanna Durbin headed for New York right after "Mad About Music" was in the can. Eddie Cantor was taking his radio troupe East and we thought perhaps that was the reason for Deanna's trip. But nothing like it! "That's just incidental, though very nice," said Deanna. "I'd like to see what the women in New York are wearing before I do my shopping."

"A cleansing cream that also nourishes the skin is a great achievement"

Mrs. Arthur Richardson

Mrs. Arthur Richardson

Granddaughter of the late C. OLIVER ISELIN

"I am delighted with the new Pond's Cold Cream. Now that we can have the benefits of the 'skin-vitamin' in Pond's Cold Cream, I wonder how women were ever satisfied to use cleansing creams that did not also nourish!"

A NEW KIND of cream is bringing more direct help to women's skin. It is bringing to their aid the vitamin which helps the body to build new skin tissue—the important "skin-vitamin."

Within recent years doctors have learned that one of the vitamins has a special relation to skin health. When there is not enough of this "skin-vitamin" in the diet, the skin may suffer, become undernourished, rough, dry, old looking!

Essential to Skin Health

Pond's tested this "skin-vitamin" in Pond's Creams during more than 3 years. In animal tests, the skin became rough, old looking when the diet lacked "skin-vitamin." But when Pond's Cold Cream containing "skin-vitamin" was applied daily, it became smooth, supple again—in only 3 weeks!

Now women everywhere are enjoying the benefits of Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream. They are reporting that pores are looking finer, that skin is smoother; best of all, that the use of this cream gives a livelier, more glowing look to their skin!

make me a studio relative. "Because," she pointed out, "they didn't have influence enough to get me jobs."

"I'm going into pictures," she told this uncle. "What can you do for me?"

"I can introduce you to the casting director. After that you're on your own."

"Would you work on a weekly basis?" the casting director asked.

"I'd work on any basis, so long as I can work."

She was sent to the studio dramatic school, and before long the coach presented her and Bob Young as the leads in one of his plays. Mayer and Thalberg were impressed with the work of both young people and put them under contract.

The seventeen-year-old might have been excused at this point for regarding the world as her oyster. "I was gay and I did have fun, but not nearly so much as I got the name for. More than anything else I wanted to work, and I couldn't understand why they put me into so few pictures."

Again she put into practice her theory that what you wanted you had to go after. She went to a woman high in authority. "Why don't they let me work more?" she asked bluntly.

"Well, I don't know, Mary. Maybe they think you're a little flighty. Maybe if you settled down and seemed more serious—"

"Settle down, huh?" she thought grimly. "All right, I'll settle." She subdued her laughter and practised a Garbo smile. She walked sedately. Instead of waving and calling "hello" across the commissary, she bowed with dignity and murmured "how d'you do." Much good it did her. One day she was summoned to the front office. "What's wrong with you, Mary? We hear you're going high hat."

She broke into a wail. "Well, tell me what you want me to do and I'll do it."

"Want you to do? Nothing. Just don't go snooty on us."

"That was when I learned my lesson," said Mary. "I'd pretended to be a glamour girl and flopped. I'd pretended to be a grand lady and flopped. Right then and there I made up my mind. 'You're going to be just your own no-make-believe self, Mary Carlisle, and if you can't make a go of yourself, you'll quit.'"

MARY'S agent had a good many clients, of whom she was not the most important. Option time came along, and she was due for a salary raise. The agent told her that the option would be taken up, but without a raise.

"Go in and fight for it," said Mary.

"Well, these things have to be handled carefully."

They were handled so carefully that nothing happened.

"All right," thought angel-face Mary. "If he can't do it for me, I'll do it for myself."

She went to headquarters. "We'd like to keep you, Mary, at the same salary."

"Then I don't want to stay," she told them flatly. "If you're not interested enough to give me my raise, then you're not interested enough."

Nor was she bluffing. She knows how to face facts. "Of course I'd have been terribly unhappy if they'd let me go. But also I knew there was no sense in staying unless they believed in me. And the proof would be, raise or no raise."

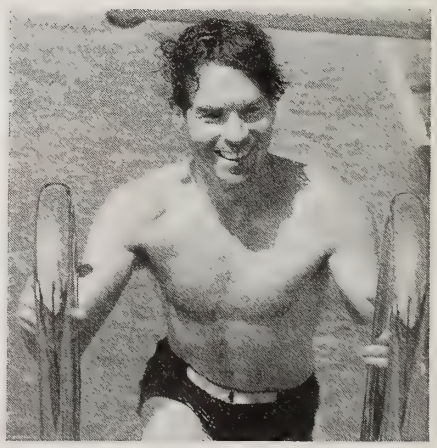
It proved to be raise, and from that day to this she's been her own agent.

Not long ago she had a crucial decision to make. Two companies were interested in signing her, one of them Paramount. The other offered more money. As against the larger salary she weighed these facts in the balance: she'd already made a favorable impression at Paramount. She liked the people she'd worked with and the atmosphere of the studio; at this stage in her career, money was less important than building solidly for the future, and she felt that her best chance lay with the reorganized Paramount under Zukor.

But she didn't fling herself headlong into their arms, crying: "Take me."

"I'll be glad to sign on certain terms," she told William Le Baron.

That was when he threw up his hands and yelled for somebody who could handle Mary.



Mary just smiled. "I've agreed to less money than I could have got elsewhere. In return, I want the studio to take care of my fan mail, to provide my shoes and stockings, and transportation for my mother when we go on location. Also I want a three months' holiday before the contract starts. I'm going to Europe. I won't haggle about any of those things. If you want me on those terms, all right. If not—"

The terms were agreed on, and she went abroad. When I tell you that she went primarily to see Europe's great paintings, you'll probably get that pained look and say, "Oh sure." To be honest, I felt the same impulse. I, too, have accepted the cliché that to actresses, and especially little blonde ones, pictures mean moving pictures and nothing else. Mary Carlisle shamed me out of my smugness.

SHE had another reason for taking her trip when she did. "I was just getting over a big romance," she admitted, "and I thought I'd get over it faster away from home. I did, too. Now it doesn't hurt any more, and we're the best of friends. I mean that, you know," she said earnestly. "Please don't think it's just Hollywood bunk. If two people make a mistake, why should they suddenly stop speaking and stick their noses in the air and hate each other? That's good enough for children. Grownups are supposed to be sane. I don't hate this boy. I like him. And why should I stop being his friend just because once I thought we'd be more than friends? It doesn't make sense."

She flashed one of those smiles that must have been Laemmle's reason for "mischievous angel." "How I feel about it is rather mixed. I think it's silly to say you won't fall in love. I see a lot of Johnny Downs now. First, you can't help it, and second—gosh!—why should you hide away from happiness?

"Just the same, I'd like not to fall in love or marry for a while yet, since I'm young and haven't done much in pictures."

Nothing like an exhilarating dip to give Fred MacMurray that zip for which he's famous.

BOB SPEAKS UP

fellow has thought of hitting him."

"If I happened to be on the street where there was a fight, I'd always find myself left with the fighting to do," he laughed. "Maybe I didn't know what the fight was about, but it was always little Douglas who did it and got the blame for starting it. One day I was innocently roped into a row and it ended with a cop giving me a broken nose. That cured me."

When he was sixteen, he decided it was time for him to assume the burdens of the family, so he left school permanently and got himself a job as messenger boy for the Seaboard National Bank.

"And that was one time when honesty wasn't the best policy," he told me. "I lost that job because I told the truth."

Messenger boys were required to wear their wallets strapped to their shoulders, but Bob's was always slipping off, so he carried it. One day he lost it, along with checks, money, and other valuables in it. The wallet was recovered. It was the boy's first offense, and he would undoubtedly have been excused with a reprimand if he had not admitted that he was carrying it in his hand. As an example, he was fired. Next he was riding instructor at Mt. Vernon, New York, and after that he signed aboard several boats of the Grace Line, shipping as an ablebodied seaman. He made the trip between New York and California several times. Toiling twenty hours a day didn't seem right, however, so he quit the sea when he docked in New York at the end of one trip.

A friend suggested that he pose as a model until he could get some other job. Posing was always fallen back on by thespians who were "resting." Finally he joined a little theatre group and while connected with it, began to make the rounds of the casting offices. His first professional role was in "Criminal Code".

In rapid succession he played in one stock company after another. While appearing with Cecilia Loftus at Bar Harbor, Maine, a motion picture talent scout persuaded him to make a screen test. As a result Bob came to Hollywood with a Paramount contract. Then he learned that having a contract didn't necessarily mean that he was an actor. Although he appeared in several pictures, it was only in minor roles. Finally he asked for a release from his contract and went into a stage play with May Robson.

While he was appearing in this play, Darryl Zanuck saw him and offered him a contract with Twentieth Century-Fox. Up to this time he had been known as Douglas Blackley, but his new employers planned to re-christen him Robert Kent.

Bob appreciates the opportunities the past year has offered. He appreciates the chance to make money. But when he is through in pictures he wants to go into the advertising business. He doesn't want ever to be a character actor, he says firmly.

"Of course," he said seriously, "no one can say what he is or isn't going to do. That would be silly. But advertising is what I would like to do when I'm not working in pictures anymore."

THE Kents are living temporarily in the little white house that his wife, Astrid Allwyn, occupied before their marriage. "And Doug pays the rent now," she informed me. "This house is too small for two people," she continued. "It was just right for me, but look," and she opened a drawer in the huge, white dressing table which she had made and which occupies one whole side of the room, "I've had to give him half the space."

"Well, there's your horse," Bob laughed, pointing to a little horse carved out of wood. "And there's yours," replied Astrid, pointing to another one on his end of the table.

Giggling, they explained that the horses were to be used as messengers if one ever tires of the other. If Bob should find a horse beside his plate at the breakfast table some morning, it would mean that as far as Astrid is concerned, the romance is over. And vice versa. The idea was that by using the little horses, it would save a lot of argument.

"We don't argue, because if one of us gets upset, the other kids about it," Astrid said, and Bob agreed with a nod.

They met for the first time when they worked together in "Dimples", these two, and Bob said, "I got that buzz, you know. It couldn't be anything but love."

The first day of the picture Bob startled her by apologizing for staring at her. "I can't help it," he told her. And Astrid, having been in Hollywood for five years, thought to herself: "Another flirt."

They didn't get on very well at first. For instance, there was the scene where the script indicated they must kiss.

"I don't want to kiss him," Astrid complained.

"It's a silly place for a kiss," Bob protested to the director, while secretly hoping it would be left in. The kiss was left in and later seemed such a good idea that they practiced it in private. Bob always fights for what he wants and he wooed her enthusiastically but without marked success. One night he had given her a sales talk on marriage all evening. It got to be twelve

"All right," he said, "I suppose you think I'm not good enough to marry you."

Astrid didn't pull that old bromide about it being "so sudden," but she did intimate that they might wait a little longer. At the first hint of success, Bob took new hope and at one o'clock she said "yes". They were married the next day.

If Astrid makes the pictures she has contracted for, she will be as busy as Bob will be with his new contract. "But if the stork comes around, I'm not going to send him away just for a picture," she said firmly. "I want to have children. We both do," and Bob nodded vigorously.

"When Doug gets to be a big star and starts upstaging me, I'll have a lot of children—so many he can't hide them from his public," Astrid threatened. "And if he starts bragging about what a big star he is, I'll just say, 'Well, look what a big producer I am!'"

"You win!" he told her, but the look in his eyes belied his words. He has won the girl of his choice, he is winning success in his work, and it seems to me he will always win—at life.

Then 3 kinds of strength-building iron and pasteurized ale yeast are added.

The result is these new easy-to-take Ironized Yeast tablets, which thousands of formerly skinny people who needed their elements hail as one of the greatest weight-building, health-building discoveries of all time.

LOVE IS OUT

fact that I have as much of a social life as the next fellow who has a job that takes most of his time.

"Actually, I have three jobs. I'm on the screen, I'm on the radio, I'm on the concert stage. Why work so hard? Well, I've got only so many notes in my throat, and I want to get them out while I can.

"On days like this, working from eight to six, singing the same song forty or fifty times, I get blamed sick of hearing my own voice. On days like this, I could give retirement a passing thought. If I had time. But tomorrow I'll be doing some other kind of scene, that's one nice thing about the movies, and probably looking forward to my next day of singing. That's life.

"No, seriously, I haven't any plans about retirement. Even indefinite ones. The last thing I want to do is to sit around, doing nothing. That doesn't appeal to me. The chief reason why I'm a singer is that it's the most interesting life I've encountered yet. If you know a job that's more interesting, bring it on, I'll consider that, too.

"I gave up a lot to be a singer. I had to struggle for years, learning how to use my voice, learning how to comport myself on the stage, acquiring a repertoire. This would be a heck of a time to retire. I'm just beginning to have the fun of working out what I've learned.

"Even when I'm working, I get in one to three or four hours of practice a day, building up my repertoire. By the time we go on our tour, my accompanist, Theodore Paxson, and I won't need any music. We can walk into a concert hall with our hands in our pockets and go to work. If television reared its head tomorrow, I'd jump in and find out what it was all about, try to be ready for it.

"Accidents don't often happen in singing careers. You have to be ready for the breaks when the breaks are ready for you, or you're sunk.

"There's been just one accident in my career. Pictures. They were pure accident. A lucky accident. I came out here for a concert, some studio executives heard me, and I was yanked into the movies. It had never occurred to me to try to be an actor. Particularly a movie actor. I had blue eyes and blond hair, which, I had been told, were what the movies didn't want. On top of that, I was an opera star, and people don't like that kind of singing.

"You know about the sitting around I did, learning something about movie-making. You know about the false starts I made. But I don't think one of the reasons for my slow start on the screen has ever come out. When I first landed in Hollywood, recording equipment wasn't what it is today. Sound engineers ripped their hair when I started singing; they told me I'd have to quiet down. But I was mean. I won't fix my voice for their machines. I made them fix the machines for my voice. Now I yell my lungs out, and they yell for me to sing louder."

He leaned back, enjoying his cigarette.

"What did I give up to be a singer? You wouldn't be trying, by any chance, to bring love into the conversation again? Nix. The principal thing I gave up was leisure. I gave up time to do countless other things I'd like to do. There are a lot of books I'd like to read, there are a lot of shows I'd like to see. There's a little trip to the Mediterranean I'd like to get out of my system. I'd like to sail more, do more fishing, ride horseback out in the wilds.

"There are a lot of interesting people I might have met if I had stayed in the East. But there are people out here who are just as interesting. Some of them have great stories. Listening to them sort of gets that old reporter blood in me pounding again."

That's right. For all his disinterest in newspapers today, he used to work on one, in Philadelphia. How did that happen?

"Well, I had to pay for music lessons some way. And as long as I had to have a job, I wanted one with a little variety. That was one reason why I liked newspaper work. And, afterward, work as a copywriter in an advertising agency. It wasn't the same old grind, day after day. Every day brought a new problem to tackle.

"I thought I was pretty versatile in those days. Actually, I was just being scattery. I could write a little, draw a little, sing a little, fish a little, hunt a little. But I wasn't really good at any one thing. Because I wasn't concentrating on any one thing. I was just drifting—and I didn't know where. The day I realized that, I started concentrating. I picked singing. I had been doing that since I was ten.

"I told you a few minutes ago that I'm just beginning to have the fun there is in singing. I used to be a much stricter musician than I am now. I had to be. A beginner can't take licenses. He has to follow all the rules of voice technique, if he wants the critics to listen to him. Just as a young painter has to paint straight, to prove that he can, before people will take him seriously if he tries to be original.

"Look at Chaliapin. One of the most popular singers of all time. Yet when he sings, the result is completely unlike the song as written. He could sing straight. But he believes in telling a story."

Nelson should know. He makes a concert tour across the country every year, singing two or three or four times a week, in as many different cities. As soon as he finishes "The Girl of the Golden West," he is starting a new tour. He has never started so late in the season before. But never before has he made two pictures in one year.

"I don't see any signs of a let-up ahead—thank God!" he told me. "Hollywood can't understand why I rush right from pictures into concerts. Hollywood thinks I must have a cash-register mind. But Hollywood has a habit of getting me wrong.

"I can use the money; I don't deny that. But I can think of easier ways to earn it than on concert tours. I go on these tours every year for two reasons. In the first place, they sublimate my lust for travel. At the same time, facing all kinds of audiences, in all kinds of towns, under all kinds of conditions, is invaluable experience. It keeps me toned up, on my toes, constantly trying to improve."

HAS BOB TAYLOR HAD A CHANGE OF HEART?

to the radio and fool around with the horses and read agricultural bulletins. We haven't changed. Nothing is changed.

"I've come back and I've picked up just where I left off. I've moved into my place in the San Fernando Valley. Two miles from Barbara's ranch, Marwyck, my place is. Thirty acres, I have, with a palatial mansion of four rooms thereon! On the goodly Taylor acres I have some horses, just to galumph around on, not to race. I also grow alfalfa, the better to feed the horses, my dear. I grow citrus and a thing called pineapple guava which, my mother and Barbara assure me, can be resolved into jelly! My mother still has her house in Beverly Hills and time marches on!

"As for other items which have been hinted about my person, let's see—I do not wear English clothes. Not a sock did I buy in all England, let Bond Street beckon as it may. I did buy some English clothes to wear in the picture but what with the duty and rough wear and tear they got I gave them all away before I shipped for home. I have not a trace of an English accent, as you have observed.

"I did try to acquire one, at first, thinking it would come in handy for the picture when, as a Yank at Oxford I am supposed to be quite Anglicized at the picture's end. But after losing my way in a maze of Cockney dialects and Kentish dialects and dialects from Surry and Shropshire and this 'shire and that, I gave it up and stuck to the Nebraskan I was born to. I have no trouble with the old familiar right hand drive because I never really learned the left hand drive over there. My house was twenty-five miles from the studio. I didn't know the roads nor did I have time to familiarize myself with the country and so I rented a car and a chauffeur. And felt like a damned fool, if I may say so, never having been chauffeur-driven before.

"I am four months and some days older than I was when I went away, there's no denying that. But whether I am older and quieter or younger and gayer I wouldn't be knowing. It all depends, I fear, on the mood, the wax or wane of the moon, the hour of the night and what I've eaten for dinner," laughed Bob.

"I cannot," he continued, with pleasurable malice, "discourse learnedly or romantically about the women of other nations, don't you know, because I didn't meet the ladies. I didn't have one single date the whole time I was away. Not one.

I STILL think Hollywood is the place of places to live. I'm modern enough, I guess, to like the white new houses, the newness and beginningness of it all. It looked good to me as my plane sighted it, flying in. I do want, very much, to go back to England. I didn't have a chance to really see it. I didn't even do any of the touristy things. I did not see the Royal Family nor visit the Cheshire Cheese and sit in the chair Charles Dickens once occupied. I didn't visit the Tower of London nor the British Museum. But I want to go back and do all of these things. I want very much to go back to Sweden. I've always had a terriffic yen to travel. If I've changed in any way, it's in an accentuation of that yen.

"I've been asked what I missed most, looking back on Hollywood from so many thousands of miles away. You guess! Right. Naturally, I missed my mother and Barbara the most, and our friends. Next I missed my car. In the studio I missed, most of all, the prop boys and carpenters and electricians who, over here, are my friends. I missed not being able to call the crew by their first names. I got so that I could decipher their dialects after a time and then everything was jake.

"No, I wasn't homesick. I'm not the homesick type. I knew that I was coming home again, anyway and besides, I adjust easily and happily to any environment. I'm the adaptable kind who could be equally content in a hovel or in a palace, in Paris or in Peoria. Doesn't matter a hoot in hell to me where I live!"

I said, "How did you feel about your own importance in the scheme of things when you got away and saw something of the 'great, wide, wonderful world?' How did you feel about the importance of pictures, the importance of Hollywood?"

"I don't know that I've ever had any passionate convictions about my own importance," Bob said, "except that I feel that any man doing any job is important in his own little niche, however small. A nail-driver at work on a skyscraper must have a steady hand and a steady purpose or he's apt to cause the whole structure to go haywire. As for Hollywood, well, Hollywood and New York are the two places everyone asks questions about, everywhere. But you know, they don't ask so many questions about personalities as they used to do, I'm told.

"Tell you one thing I learned, all right, and that's how important the foreign market is to us here in Hollywood. Boy! The foreign market can make all the difference between a star being tops on the box office list or twenty-seventh. It's a huge market, you see, wherever our pictures are freely admitted, England, Scandinavia, France and so on.

I LEARNED, too," said Bob, "why the English actors are such swell actors—Leslie Howard, Ronald Colman, Bart Marshall, Alan Mowbray and the others. It's because they care about the theatre, never get very far away from it, will drop any movie contract, however fat, to do a thing on the stage. It's because they would rather be paid a ha'penny worth of dried herring for a good part on the stage than millions for a picture. They care about acting, the English tradition, not care about Shakespeare and tradition, not about notoriety and noise-makers blaring how good they are. This chap Griffith Jones, who has as big a part as mine in the picture, if not bigger, he's terrific. The best type of Englishman, long and lean, with aquiline features. I told him he'd be tremendous in Hollywood but I doubt that he would come here. Not while the old Drury Lane and others still use actors.

"As for myself," said Bob, and now the depth of his voice was deeper, his blue eyes black with seriousness, "I don't care what I play so long as I can get out of dress suits, leading man things, romantic roles, all that tinsel. I've been limited, much too limited in the stories I've played in, the parts I've played. I'd play a Western if I could do one. I want to get parts where I can wear overalls, leave my hair uncombed and unbrushed, forget to shave for a few days. My first picture after my return is to be 'Three Comrades' with Bob Young, Franchot Tone and Margaret Sullavan, I believe. That's okay. Nothing dressed-up, fancied-up about that!"

Martha Raye knuckles down to the absorbing task of making a pastry shell for her favorite pie.

For the second step, she slowly adds a cup of pineapple juice to the rich filling of this dessert.

Our star cook now tops the filled pie shell with the fluffiest of meringue for that final touch.

EASY AS PIE

By MARJORIE DEEN

EASY AS PIE! Well that certainly describes Martha Raye's idea of a perfect meal, the sort she likes so well that she frequently prepares and serves it her very own self on the maid's night out. Martha is really very fond of cooking, as it happens, so she takes advantage of this once-weekly occasion by inviting her friends to join her and her mother for dinner.

And does she shine at the mixing bowl and stove? Well I'm here to tell you she does! Furthermore she asserts that she takes off her hat to no one when it comes to planning and dishing up, in short order, a simply grand and grandly simple meal. It didn't take long either, to discover that I could enthusiastically endorse her choice of foods.

Here then is Martha's favorite menu:

Hamburger Steak with Onions
Corn Pone
Shredded Cabbage and Raw Carrot Salad
Boiled Dressing
Pineapple Cream Pie
Coffee

No potatoes, you'll notice. But if you insist, you can take care of this missing feature very simply by baking the spuds along with corn pone.

As for the rest of the meal, well, with the exception of the pie (and I'm giving you the recipe for that) it requires but the fewest words of explanation and the shortest possible period of preparation. Much of the work can be done well in advance, too. The dry ingredients for the corn pone can be measured and combined in the morning if you choose. The carrots and cabbage for the salad should be placed in the refrigerator hours early to chill, though of course you wouldn't think of adding the salad dressing until the very last moment. Hamburgers and onions require but a moment's attention and there you are, all ready for dinner!

But how about the pie? Well that too can be made in one-two-three fashion well ahead of time. The shell can be baked even a day ahead, if you choose. The filling too, for that matter. Then a couple of hours before dinner time, you simply spread the filling in the shell, top it with meringue and bake it slowly. A short spell to cool off and there you are. But why go into that now, when you have Martha's recipe, right here, to follow.

"If you want to be really fancy," suggests Martha Raye, "you can place the meringue in a pastry tube and squeeze it out in professional-looking curleycues and doodads. But whatever you do, don't bake the meringue too quickly or you'll spoil it completely and past all hope."

Serve this delectable pie after just such a meal as the one she outlined for us and you'll discover, as I did, that Miss Raye's simple, homey menu will win you paens of praise.

PINEAPPLE CREAM PIE
with
"FEATHER-LIGHT" MERINGUE

Pie Filling

1 cup drained, canned crushed pineapple
1 cup pineapple juice and water, combined
4 tablespoons flour
2 tablespoons cornstarch
1 cup sugar
1 cup scalded milk
3 egg yolks
1 tablespoon butter
¼ teaspoon salt
grated rind and juice of ½ lemon
baked pie shell

Open a large can of crushed pineapple (No. 2 size can). Turn contents into a strainer or collander, set over a bowl to drain. Measure resulting pineapple juice and add more water, if necessary, to make 1 cup of pineapple liquid. Combine flour, cornstarch and sugar. Slowly add scalded milk, stirring vigorously. Place in top of double boiler. Cook and stir over boiling water and, while stirring, slowly add the cup of pineapple liquid referred to above. Continue cooking 10 minutes longer, stirring occasionally. Separate eggs, reserving whites in refrigerator for meringue. Beat yolks slightly, add a little of the hot mixture to them, then add slowly to remaining mixture in top of double boiler. Cook 3 minutes longer, stirring constantly. Remove from heat, add butter, salt, lemon rind, lemon juice and 1 cup of the very well drained crushed pineapple. Blend thoroughly, chill. Turn into a baked pie shell. Cover with the following Meringue and place in slow oven (300° F.) for fifteen minutes, or until meringue is puffed and a pale golden brown.

"FEATHER-LIGHT" MERINGUE

3 egg whites
6 tablespoons granulated sugar
⅛ teaspoon cream of tartar

Beat egg whites until stiff but not dry. Gradually beat in half of the sugar combined with the cream of tartar. (Use a wire whisk rather than a rotary beater for really "feather-light" results.) When half of the sugar has been beaten in, fold in the remaining sugar gently. If desired, a little flavoring may be added—about ½ teaspoon of vanilla or as little as ¼ teaspoon of other extracts being sufficient.

"Remember," says Martha, "the meringue mustn't start to brown for seven minutes or longer and if, after the specified fifteen minutes baking time, it isn't brown enough to suit you then it's far better to raise the heat for the last minute or so than it is to take chances with too hot an oven at the beginning! So mind Martha now!"

Some time try this delicious pineapple-flavored hot bread, too, all rich and fragrant and healthful with its honey, bran and chopped nuts. Better not have it when you are serving Martha's pie as dessert, however. Because it would be considered bad meal planning, you know, to have two recipes calling for the same fruit on the same menu, yes, even when the fruit in question is as justly popular as is canned pineapple. However I do want you to have the recipe for this delicious quick-bread in your files because it provides you with such a grand suggestion for using up that extra cup of pineapple juice left over from breakfast. For that matter, once you've tried this Hawaiian Honey Bread, you'll not wait for any such excuse but will plan always to have on hand one of the small 8-ounce size cans which contain just the right amount for the one loaf recipe which follows.

HAWAIIAN HONEY BREAD

¼ cup butter
1 cup strained honey
1 egg
2¼ cups sifted flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
¾ teaspoon salt
1 cup all bran
1 cup unsweetened canned pineapple juice
¾ cup chopped nut meats

Cream butter well. Add honey. Cream together thoroughly. Add egg and beat with rotary beater until light and creamy. Sift flour, measure. Add baking powder and salt and sift again. Stir one half of dry ingredients into honey mixture. Add all bran and pineapple juice and mix thoroughly. Add remaining dry ingredients to which nut meats have been added. Stir only until all flour disappears. Turn into greased loaf pan (lined on the bottom with wax paper and greased again.) Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 1¼ hours approximately, or until loaf is firm and a cake tester inserted in center of loaf comes out clean. Cool on wire cake rack. This bread may be eaten while still hot but it slices better after being kept twenty-four hours.

This bread is just the sort of thing to make a real hit with the youngsters, you'll find. Or, cut wafer-thin, it can be made into the most tempting of sandwiches for a company tea party. So with this simple-to-follow recipe you can please the family and win new cooking laurels from your friends.

A Tribute to Morris

You can have your Robert Taylor
With his lovely wavy hair
You can have your Ronald Colman
With his manner debonair.
You can have young Kenny Baker
With his voice just like a lark
And dashing Tyrone Power
Can always toe the mark.
Joel McCrea is always good,
For performance fine and dandy
As for singing, Nelson Eddy
Makes the fair sex melt like candy.
But of all these well known heroes
There is one—a shining star
A handsome unspoiled youngster
Who is bound to go so far.
To the amazing Movie Kingdom
His wandering feet did stray
And now his popularity
Will have no more delay.
He's very new this fellow
Whom my little pen does stress
He's starred in but two pictures
But he's now among the best.
As the handsome Kid in Galahad
He grinned his way to fame
In his performance in Submarine
He nothing did disdain.
You now know whom I speak of
For that smile that brought him fame
Belongs to no one other
Than that handsome boy named Wayne.

Who Is Queen?

It is my belief that the men of America are the victims of a grave injustice. Every time a man picks up a movie book, what does he see? Raves about Robert Taylor, Tyrone Power or Clark Gable. Do the men like this? I don't.

If it were left to the women, the fair sex in Hollywood would rarely be mentioned in fan mail departments. Are the men supposed to sit down and take this without a murmur? You're right, they won't. So, girls, if you're on the level, give the girls a break for a change.

As long as the women have been given their chance to do their hero worshipping in print, suppose we men get busy and do some heroine worshipping. What we want to know is Who Is Queen of the Masculine Hearts?

Too Much Slapstick

When James Cagney squirted grape-fruit in his leading lady's eye, and Clark Gable struck his heroine harder than Emily Post okays, they were simply paving the way for a cycle of sophisticated slap-stick.

In "Double Wedding", Myrna Loy cracked a picture over the noble Powell brow. Carole Lombard and Fredric March have plenty of free-for-alls in "Nothing Sacred", and Irene Dunne had a rollicking good time aggravating Cary Grant in "The Awful Truth". What with Miriam Hopkins doing some hair-pulling and leg-biting in "Wise Girl", Claudette Colbert biting Gary Cooper in "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife", and Gladys Swarthout receiving a lusciously ripe tomato in the face in "Romance in the Dark", it looks as though we're in for it!

The Mack Sennett custard-pie touch as practiced in "Private Lives" and "It Happened One Night" is appreciated now and then. But all this scratching, biting and packing a mean wallop—what will its effects be? Will these actresses be able to step back into "safe and sane" roles?—Mary F. Donner, Seattle, Wash.

Here's to you, Martha Raye!

My letter is about the story concerning Martha Raye in the February issue of MODERN SCREEN.

Aren't movie stars human? Evidently the columnist who panned Martha Raye doesn't think so. Wouldn't anyone who suddenly found he was making a salary large enough to make all his dreams come true rush out and buy himself some lovely clothes, a new car, and a beautiful home? I'm certain that I would; it's the human thing to do.

Martha Raye, in my opinion, is a grand comedienne and as long as she continues to turn in those hilarious performances, I think she's entitled to do just about as she pleases. So, here's to Martha Raye—may she buy all the furs and dresses that she wants! It's her money, and, as she says, "You can't take it with you."—Martha Earle, Nashville, Tenn.

A Plea For Simplicity

It can be recaptured, can't it? The refreshing sweetness of "Seventh Heaven" was still there when Simone Simon and James Stewart played the roles in the third production of the picture.

They are not handsome nor beautiful but much, much more. They symbolize the essence of life, youth—carefree and spirited. The secret of their acting ability is that they do not try to impress their audience. They seem to live the parts they are portraying. After all, real people on the screen appeal to us and we haven't lost our taste for real stories.

Why, why do the people who make our pictures give us so much ermine, sequins,

'N' ME

Stardom brings luxuries to Martha Raye—and why not?

winding stairways, and impossible stories when we are satisfied with less "foo" and prefer simpler, sweeter stories with humor, pathos, and romance?—Ula Atterberry, Peoria, Ill.

$1.00 Prize Letter
The Awful Truth

If more of our problems were presented to us in the vein of "The Awful Truth", we'd see just how silly and ridiculous some of them are.

In "The Awful Truth" we have a well-known problem gayly decorated with laughter and clever dialogue. Without preaching it drives home a point in a most subtle and effective manner. We are shown how a suspicious nature can make a mountain out of a mole-hill—especially in wedded life—and how this complex can nearly ruin the happiness of marriage. And most everyone thinks as the Warriners did that the divorce court is the only solution.

It's films like "The Awful Truth" which make screenfare more than just a pleasant way to pass time.—Samela Parkhurst, Seattle, Wash.

More Power, Please!

Whom do all the maidens cry for,
Whose charms do all young swains sigh for?
Power!
Whose pictures do we send away for,
Whose movies do we gladly pay for?
Power!
With whom do we annoy our mothers,
Who wins scorn from jealous brothers?
Power!
Who's the man who smashed that fable
That the girls all go for Gable?
Power!
Who's the hero of the hour
He's our idol, TYRONE POWER!

HONEYMOON HOME

the ceiling and fireplace panel are of pickled pine. And there's the deeper brown of fine antique pieces and the warmer brown of the sprawly loop chairs.

Miriam's paintings are a story in themselves. Sign posts of her career. For example that John Carroll lady, mounted in solitary glory above the mantel. Broadway had just begun to take the little Hopkins to its heart when she bought that. It took most of her savings but to her it was a symbol of success, of dreams fulfilled. It meant the small Alabama towhead who had started out with nothing much but spirit and a defiant young will, had reached her first milestone. The Metisse marked the second. She had scored with Chevalier on the screen and Hollywood, overnight, was distinctly Hopkins-conscious. Instead of celebrating with a mink coat she celebrated with a Metisse. Then came the Renoir (hanging above the Louis XV desk), and the two Picassos in Miriam's bedroom—evidences of the flood tide of fame. But it's as George Gershwin once said, "If Miriam didn't have a penny, she would still have beautiful things around her or make them seem beautiful."

Before his death, you could usually find Gershwin up there on Sunday evenings, sitting at the grand piano, idling over it. Miriam's Sunday evenings are famous.

They never start out to be parties. They simply grow that way. And you can be sure of two things—brilliant talk and a brilliant time. "Won't you drop over?" says Miriam. And half of Hollywood does. Writers, artists, composers. . . . She goes in for the gypsy type of entertaining, never formal "because you can't have so much fun!" Everybody sits on the floor and sings. Her cook, who comes from Prague and is a genius, shakes her head. Six were expected for supper. Twenty have turned up. But somehow Cook resurrects a turkey stuffed with truffles and a dozen other miraculous dishes. How she does it nobody knows. Sometimes a small Russian orchestra appears or a miniature Tzigani band that breaks into strange wailings. But as a rule the guests supply their own entertainment.

It was at that surprise birthday party Litvak gave Miriam, that George Antheil composed a song hit right on the spot and dedicated it to her. That's the way it is at Miriam's. Somebody casually tells a story and another movie is born. Things happen there.

She'd rather eat off a tray than a table any day but occasionally she does give a regular dinner party. Never for more than eight. First, of course, you have cocktails in the intimate little bar off the living-room. It's done all in the seasoned pine, and accordion doors open into it. You just have time to discover how funny the James Thurber drawings are and how fascinating your fellow guests can be when dinner is served. You're never kept waiting.

There is not a single artificial light in the dining room. Only candlelight. Even the side brackets hold candles set in glass prisms. The drapes are the same as those in the living room, printed linen in brown and white. The walls are the same soft blue tone as the other walls and the rug is old ivory. But the furniture is original Chippendale. In the cabinet are antique sepia marine plates that were new when Cape Cod was founded. It's a straightforward room with a quaint and fluty air.

An elegant balcony opens off the dining room. And when the moon comes up over it, a gypsy band is playing softly underneath, and you're dining in the candlelight—oh, Miriam knows how to give her parties the enchanted touch!

This is not the only balcony in the house. "Maybe it's the Southern in me. Or," she chuckled, "a throwback to some sentimental aunt. But I adore small balconies. There were three of them here to begin with and I added two." Since the living and dining quarters and master bedroom suite are on the second level (remember it's a mountainside house!) they can all boast balconies.

Miriam's private one is a dream. She can lie in bed and see "half of Hollywood" over it. Incidentally, she hates getting up. She would rather sleep all day and be up all night. ("Stage training, my dear!" she says.) The one highlight of her bedroom is—comfort. No feminine fussiness. There is a grand fireplace, a big woolly reading chair in sand color and a warm, woolly rug of the same shade. The bedspread of raw silk is in blue and those drapes are in a hand woven blue and chartreuse plaid. The furniture is bleached birch.

Over all this, presides Miriam's little French maid. Now Mimi, who has been with her for years, has a system. If Madame is in a pensive mood she lays out black velvet for evening. If she's very gay, Mimi lays out white—usually in a moire or crepe. Colors? Mais non, Madame seldom wears them in formal clothes. An occasional chartreuse, perhaps. Or a deep, rich burgundy. And for the soigné party she wears silver or gold lamés. "Around the house," says Mimi, "is another mattaire." Madame loves the little tailored pajamas and short brocaded jackets. She can lounge in them—and read. Mon Dieu, how she reads! Three books a week and all the magazines."

That accounts for it. The "book corner" in every room. In the living room, of course, there are regiments of books marching up and down the walls on either side of the fireplace. Not in stilted rows. In used rows. In her own room a half dozen or so lie conveniently on the round birch table.

Neat shelves of them are within easy reach of the big leather chair in Anton Litvak's room. This is done all in creamy white and burgundy red and old mahogany. There's an interesting lithograph by Henrietta Shore on the wall—and what Anton enjoys most are those costume sketches taken from Miriam's picture, "Becky Sharp," and matted on material from the gowns she wore in that production. His room is on the first level of the house—along with Michael's.

Michael, the small king of the establishment, is Miriam's four-year-old adopted son. She knows when he wakes. She's there at night when he goes to sleep. Michael has his own little dining room in blue and white like the nursery and seven million toys, but the Big Event in his life is going to the studio to watch "Mummy" work. "You see," he said solemnly, "we usually have ice cream. And the men with the lights let me play with them." I'm not given to drooling over children but I confess I'm a bit goofy over Michael.

Miriam's house is more than charming. It has that undeniable air of being a home.

manifold inconveniences the most manifold and mammoth is the servant problem.

"Take Daisy. When she came to us we'd been without a servant for months. Daisy came to us just in time. For we'd used up every canned tamale on the premises. Our three sets of dishes were all dirty, and what to do? Our beds hadn't been made for weeks. Our suits looked as though we had slept in them, and sometimes we had.

"Then Daisy came. Our hopes raised and our tummies growled. But for three mortal days Daisy refused point blank to cook for us. Our hollow cheeks and cavernous eyes moved her not a pang. She said that she had first to arrange her cupboards. She had every appearance of a director who is displeased with a set and just won't make mudpies, I mean pictures, until the set is rearranged. Anyway, she set to work arranging them and then, while Rome burned and our intestinal fortitude collapsed she rearranged them again. She put all the china, having laundered it, on the shelves where the canned goods had been. She put all that remained of the canned goods on the shelves where the potatoes and onions had been. Then she stood back and surveyed her handiwork.

"Our bleached bones would have been strewn about Brentwood by now had it not been for kindly folk who invited us to dinner parties, sometimes separately, occasionally together. But there is another inconvenience about being a bachelor, and a starving bachelor at that. I never can tell whether I'm being invited out for the pleasure of my company or whether I'm being invited for the same motives as prompts people to give to the community chest and the foreign missions.

"I DON'T know," sighed Jimmy, "but people don't seem to care about working for us. I call employment agencies and tell them what we want and they tell me they have a Jewel which they will drop into my lap quick like anything and then I wait around the house and no one shows.

"They think it will be too difficult, I guess. Maybe it's got around that I never remember to phone that I'm not coming home for dinner until I'm just sitting down to another dinner somewhere. Maybe they think I'm inconsiderate, not the kind of person they want to know or something. Then they may have got wind of the fact that when our dinner bell is rung we alway take it as a signal to take our showers or make those phone calls we've neglected or perhaps we're seized with a nostalgia to write long newsy letters to the folks back home or something. But Daisy is very grim about this. When she rings the dinner bell she rings the dinner bell and we come down and eat, or else.

"Before Daisy, we had a colored couple. We thought we were all set when they first came. The meals started out to be fine and dandy. Of course the bills were such that you might have supposed we were hotel proprietors doing a rush business. We told them that we should deal with a cheaper market, a sort of cut-ratish market. That night they brought in a sort of duck for dinner. The cook brought it in herself. She said 'this was a very tired duck when it arrived, suhs. It had circles under its eyes. But I have done the best I could with it, the life it has led and all. I have worked very hard to revive this duck, suhs, and the least you can do now is to eat it and like it.' I did eat it. And in the night it up and bit me on the ear and caused me many minor discomforts which I cannot go into here as there are some things a gentleman does not make public. The duck, we were told, had limped around from the cheaper market and the inference on the word 'cheap' did not seem to apply wholly and exclusively to markets. We went back, not to the cut-rate markets but to the cut-throats.

"Well, next we began to notice an appreciable falling-off in the quantity of our food. We did a little quiet sleuthing and discovered that our treasures were passionately fond of dogs. There was every intimation that the more they saw of men the better they liked dogs. We would catch, all through the days, savory odors of cooking but when the dinner hour came we would get only what might be called a snack. They were feeding the dogs, not the crumbs from our table, but the cream of the cream, and plenty of it.

"We knew that we had to get rid of the pair. But how? Not one of us had the nerve to fire them. So there we were. We didn't know what to do. We held more conferences than movie producers ever do. At last we hit it! We'd move! We'd move out of the house and leave 'em flat. We didn't like the house any too well, anyway, we said, though we'd never said so before. But there was our out. And we took it. We just folded our tents one dark and stormy night and, like the Arabs, silently went away.

"This litany of woe," said Jimmy, timidly suggesting a chicken sandwich and a glass of milk to the waitress in the studio commissary, "is not yet over. For when we disappeared from that house we turned up, somehow or other, in an apartment in the Normandy Village here in Hollywood.

"For days and weeks we did without a servant and it got to lookin' like something. Then, just as things were getting all out of control and the cupboard was bare and this little dog had none I awoke one morning to hear strange stirrings in the kitchen regions. Maybe it was a burglar, I thought. But it was too early to get up and see. So I went to sleep again and hours later I awoke and wandered out to the kitchen and there was Ellen! Ellen, without benefit of employment agency or anything. Ellen, and miracles had happened while I slept. The mounds of ashes which had given the place the look of Vesuvius after an eruption had disappeared.

"Now how, I wondered, had she managed that? The sink no longer resembled a china rummage sale. Yep, Ellen was there, big and black and competent. She worked, we learned, for the Normandy Village, part time for each tennant. We took Ellen right away from the Normandy Village. And for a time there were practically no inconveniences.

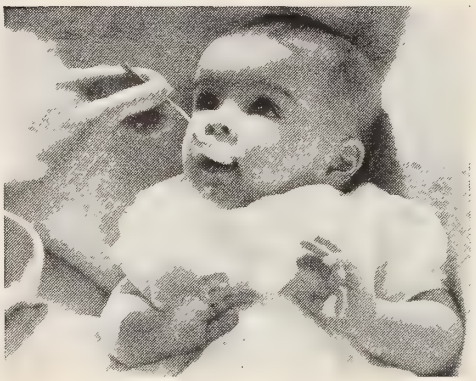
BUT all too soon it developed that Ellen was a tap dancer. And it soon further developed that Ellen's art was more to her than the combined stomachs of Stewart, Swope & Logan. She really didn't care about us compared to doing a dusky version of Fred Astaire or Eleanor Powell. And so one night Ellen went forth to her dancing lesson and just never came back. We thought of suing her for desertion but the best legal advice assured us that there is no such thing.

"Yeah," said Jimmy, tugging at his collar-length hair, "yeah, the inconveniences of being a bachelor are something like the inconveniences of married life, I bet. It's seldom the colorful, dramatic things that cause the ructions and the Reno-vatings.

"Some of the inconveniences are, really, more than just inconveniences. Some of 'em give you a kind of an ache of missing things, of time passing and cheating as it passes. For instance, I want a home. I want a home of my own and want it badly. I want to build me a house, design it, be my own architect.

"I studied architecture at Princeton, you know, with the intention of expressing myself in steel girders. So I want to put it to some use. I want to have my own furniture. I want to hang my hat on my own hatrack. I want to have my own garden and books and things. I'd like the feeling of walking on solid earth and being able to say 'this is mine.'

"I'm a possessive cuss, at heart. But as a bachelor, I don't dare to strike roots. I might build me a Georgian mansion and turn around and marry a girl who wouldn't be happy in anything but a Mediterranean type villa. The result is, I don't build. I don't settle down. I don't have anything permanent or satisfying or mine own.



"So I guess," drawled Jimmy, grinning above his pain, "that it's not the girls you take to the Troc and all who cause a bachelor his inconveniences. It's the Daisys of the world and what they do to us. I guess when you ask me about the inconveniences of being a bachelor I should just sigh and roll up my eyes and say, 'My dear, this servant problem, it will be the death of me!'"

A picture-book baby is little dark-eyed Elizabeth! Along with many of her contemporaries in a pleasant New Jersey community, she's contributing her health and growth records to a study of infant diet. Last month she started Clapp's Baby Cereal—and only a few days ago she struck up a great friendship with Clapp's Strained Spinach.

Just a luxury, that reclining position during meals, for she's quite able to sit up alone now. There's luxury, too, in the variety offered by her Clapp menus —four soups, three fruits, seven vegetables, and cereal! All vitamin-rich, because they're pressure-cooked. Result: Elizabeth has gained more than a pound and grown ¾ of an inch every month.

SPRING SMARTNESS

which of these styles are most suitable for her type and position, and decides just what she is going to buy to make her ensemble as perfect as possible. For one of her best sources of inspiration she goes to the movies and studies the styles worn by the stars, because she knows that all the ingenuity of the most talented designers has gone into the creating of these clothes which will be an important influence in future fashions worn the country over.

Andrea Leeds, as the leading feminine heart-interest in "The Goldwyn Follies," the little lady who makes good, is a typical American girl and is dressed accordingly, in good-looking, practical clothes that really are wearable and within the reach of the not-so-large clothes allowance.

ANDREA'S dark daytime dress with its refreshing touches of white at the neck and cuffs is the type of frock that is recommended to the city girl, to the girl who works in an office or store. Because the fabric is dark and simply woven, particular attention has been given to the lines and draping, which are especially suited to a beautiful, youthful figure like Andrea's. The skirt hangs straight and is slightly gathered by the soft pleats in the front. The treatment of waistline and bodice is interesting, the midriff being snugly fitted, while the top of the dress looks almost like a little bust-length jacket, buttoning with four small buttons.

The crisp white collar with its perky bow and the white cuffs on the set-in puffed sleeves give that freshly-tubbed look that is so essential to a well-groomed appearance. The ensemble is completed with accessories consisting of calf pumps trimmed with little leather bows, calf purse, doeskin gloves. Andrea's off-the-face bonnet gives her a very wide-eyed look, don't you think?

You young things who love to dance, and who go to lots of parties, will find them even more enjoyable if you look for a frock like Andrea's charmingly shaded pastel triple sheer, worn over a rustling taffeta slip. The huge "pouff" sleeves are an attractive feature, as is the wide skirt whose hemline is made to stand out bell-like with a two-toned banding of heavy corded silk ribbon. The white collar is of the same material as this band. A narrow sash from the sides ties in a tiny bow in back. The tightly-fitting waist is closed at the back with a row of small buttons leading up to the modest slit, which reaches to the neckline. Springtime is Prom time, and the gay young "prom trotter" will find a light dance frock like this invaluable.

Another of Andrea Leeds' costumes which I hope you will notice particularly is her two-piece wool suit. The straight pencil line is the most popular for suits of all types this spring. Andrea's skirt is slim and straight, as is her full-length coat. Smart details of this season are seen in the huge patch pockets, the straight sleeves, slightly puffed shoulders and the extra-wide high notched lapels of the coat. She seems to like off-the-face hats, for this one too is a simple up-in-the-front down-in-the-back model. You'll get lots of wear out of a two-piece suit like this one, with a long or three-quarter coat that can be worn over your spring prints as well. You can wear a soft silk blouse with it, as Andrea does, or one of your sweaters for spectator sports occasions.

SUITS have always held an important place in spring fashions, and this year they're being given more attention than ever before. In fact, a suit is practically a "must" for your spring wardrobe.

With your tailored suit, I would suggest that you wear a low-heeled style of shoe, such as the one Rosemary Lane has chosen for her personal wardrobe. These tan calf high-front sandals with the new punch trim on the vamps are practical as well as smart, comfortable to walk in, and easy to look at. Your spring prints, on the other hand, call for a "dressier" shoe, something like the blue gabardine pumps shown above that Rosemary's sister, Priscilla, selected. These have a higher heel, but are equally as comfortable as Rosemary's sandals. The dotted patent leather trim is a smart spring detail. If you would like to have the very same shoes worn my Rosemary and Priscilla Lane to wear with your tailored suit and spring prints, just write to me for the name of the nearest store that carries them, for both these styles are sold throughout the country. A penny postcard addressed to Ann Wills, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York City, will bring you a speedy answer.

Gracie Allen and George Burns in "College Swing" talk it over and decide how they're going to improve education.

GOOD NEWS

Marriage Expensive

There's one man in Hollywood who doesn't believe that a gal can mix marriage and career successfully. It's Harold Lloyd who's put Phyllis Welch—his new leading lady—under a contract that stipulates she'll lose $6,000 if she marries or becomes engaged within the next six months. And Harold's the one real authority on the subject—for proof look at his own marriage with his former leading lady who gave up all thoughts of the screen when she said her I do's.

Franciska Gaal, who made such an auspicious debut in "The Buccaneer," arrived in Hollywood from Budapest without a word of English to her credit. The studio hired an English tutor for the actress immediately, and after three weeks of study with him, Franciska was called for a conference at the studio to talk over her forthcoming role. She understood hardly a word spoken to her, until a producer asked her in Hungarian if there was something wrong with her tutor. "Not a thing!" Franciska assured him in her native tongue, "Only—only we liked each other so much, and had so much to talk about, that—well, he learned Hungarian."

His Knee Was Sharp

Making movies is really an unromantic business—as was evidenced on the "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife" set. For a scene, Claudette Colbert had to sit on Gary Cooper's knee. And this she did for almost five hours before the director was satisfied with the scene. Claudette didn't mind for she was comfortable—after the first hour. At that time she excused herself, and returned carrying a small pillow. "Hope you don't mind, Gary," she smiled, "but the knees are a bit sharp." "Perfectly all right," said Gary agreeably, settling the pillow and Claudette again on his knee, "you're a bit on the sharp side yourself."

■ ■ ■

Want to know who's boss around the Claudette Colbert-Joel Pressman menage? It's the doctor who rules with an iron hand, and here's the proof: When the two of them left for Europe recently, Claudette wanted to take her dog, Smoky, along as far as New York. The doctor said no, and Smoky stayed home, probably thinking bitterly of the good old days, when Claudette was single and a soft touch for a dog with nice manners and a way about him.

You Never Can Tell

Two examples of the unpredictable ways of children, even in Hollywood: The Bing Crosbys, expecting a girl, had the nursery entirely done over in pink. You know what happened. George Burns and Gracie Allen spent a week selecting expensive toys to make young Ronnie's Christmas a happy one. After Ronnie had opened them all, the item he liked best was a piece of red cellophane wrapping.

During John Barrymore's recent hegira in New York, he submitted to a caricaturist in Sardi's. When the sketch was finished and handed to Barrymore for his signature, he refused to sign until the artist removed what he considered exaggerated jowls. The artist erased the jowls, Barrymore signed and left. The artist, an unscrupulous gent, immediately replaced the jowls.

Freddie Bartholomew is a practical young man. On the "Kidnapped" set, a scene called for him to approach Warner Baxter and announce, "I am David Balfour." Freddie removed the brace from his lowers and stepped before the camera. "What about that brace on your uppers?" asked the director. "When I say 'I am David Balfour'," explained young Mr. B., "I don't move my upper lip."

No Place Like Home

Robert Taylor now has his San Fernando ranch-house completely finished and furnished. "With the maximum of comfort and the minimum of style," to quote Mr. T. And that's just about the truth. For there are just four rooms in all—and all full of furniture which has been specially built in over-sizes. The result is hardly artistic, but it's home to Bob.

■ ■ ■

Wallace Beery and his wife and Carol Ann are setting off any day now for that flying trip through Europe. He won't take his own plane, though. He'll rent planes over there. Carol Ann isn't in the least enthused about the trip. Since playing that bit—that very small bit—in "Bad Man of Brimstone" she is convinced that leaving Hollywood at this time is sheer folly.

That's Vengeance!

A year ago Helen Broderick tried to peddle her son, Broderick Crawford, to RKO for $250 a week, but the studio turned him down. Now a hit on Broadway in "Of Mice and Men," Crawford will probably receive flattering film offers when the play closes, but mama has made him promise he won't sign with RKO. If no one else offers him a job, Miss B., insists she'll pay him $250 a week herself.

Now that Bill Powell has finished "The Baroness and the Butler" with Annabella, he is seldom seen around the town's night spots —or even around the town. Once one of the gayest of the local cavaliers, he now plans to spend most of his time between pictures out of the city. He can stand Hollywood without Jean Harlow—just so long at a time.

She Got Sympathy

During the recent trial over the custody of her adopted son, Barbara Stanwyck suffered some humiliation, but she certainly lost no prestige. Frank Fay, many believe, used the trial for publicity purposes. Since the trial, Miss Stanwyck has received over 7,000 letters commending her for the honesty and sincerity she displayed during the unfortunate ordeal.

Carole Lombard's gambling instincts went wild the other day and she let herself go to the extent of taking a chance on one of those "name" punchboards. The name Carole punched was Pansy. And we regret to report that Pansy didn't do a thing for her sponsor.

He Wants Dough

The most determined riding Gene Autry ever did happened the day he rode out of Republic studio and threatened to keep riding until his contract was adjusted. Gene makes six pictures a year, and receives approximately $6,000 per picture. Considering the fact that he's Number One Cowboy these days, Autry feels the studio should share a bit more of the profits. Winning the finest gal in all the West six times a year is all right, but a guy has to be able to support her.

And So Goodbye

About to leave for New York recently, Elizabeth Patterson dropped into the office of a Paramount executive to say goodbye. "But," said the guy, "you can't leave. There's a picture listed for you on the schedule sheet." Elizabeth doubted it, so he handed her the sheet for inspection. What it said was: Elizabeth Patterson—LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Retakes on "Having Wonderful Time," the Ginger Rogers-Doug Fairbanks, Jr., picture, were ordered because producers felt that Boy didn't meet Girl soon enough. So Ginger and Doug slapped on the greasepaint and went back to meet each other again—but sooner. Which reminds us of a standing rule for scenarists at Columbia studios. Boy must meet Girl by page 22, or the script is tossed out.

Highbrow Reading

At a newsstand on Hollywood Boulevard, a dignified and very British looking gentleman in tweeds and monocle thumbs through the racy picture magazines, puts them back on their piles and buys a pulp detective magazine. Reason this is reported is that the tweedy gentleman was George Arliss.

Lady in Distress

While Doug, Sr., and his wife were away, Doug, Jr., lived in their house at Santa Monica beach. It's next door to Norma Shearer's home. Of course they knew each other, but imagine Doug's surprise to be wakened one morning about one o'clock by his butler. "Miss Shearer's at the door. Wants to see you right away." Seems that Norma had come home, opened the front door and found the hall flooded with almost a foot of water. Being a girl of ingenuity, Norma picked up her long party dress skirts, knotted them around her waist, and climbed over the fence to her neighbor's yard. There she called the plumber who had the burst pipe all fixed up, the hall drained out and everything in apple-pie order before the Shearer servants or children had a chance to be alarmed.

Just a Doodler

Monumental news from a studio press release: "Fanciest doodler in Hollywood is Fred MacMurray, star of 'Cocoanut Grove.' The actor took a course in show card writing once, and therefore doodles by making neatly formed block letters instead of the aimless curly-cues scrawled by most people." Let that be a lesson to all of us. Aimless doodling must go!

The girls who have been working with Deanna Durbin in the boarding-school scenes in "Mad About Music" have had the time of their lives. For all during the picture, there have been parties given by directors, producers and actors for the girls. Elizabeth Risdon finished up the picture with a dinner-party at a big hotel. There was fried chicken, and not a fork in sight. But that wasn't the best thing about the dinner—it was that Arthur Treacher donned his best butling outfit and manners and served them in the height of celluloid style. And if you know anything at all about butlers, celluloid or otherwise, you know that Mr. Treacher is the absolute tops! Needless to say, he was one of the most popular guests present.

Secret's Out

Marjorie Weaver, who caused a flurry in "Second Honeymoon", caused another one when she denied having stolen off to Indiana to become the bride of a naval lieutenant. However, the Indiana records prove she is now Mrs. Kenneth Schacht (pronounced Shock). But the most interesting angle of the thing is that Marjorie flew East on a pass obtained for her by a local gentleman friend, to whom the secret wedding was, to put it mildly, something of a Shock (pronounced Schacht.)

When Franchot Tone arrived back in Hollywood after spending the greater part of his vacation in New York without the Little Woman, none other than Joan herself met him at the train, thus spiking those rumors of a separation that flew all over the place while he's been away. Whether or not it's all sweetness and light with Mr. and Mrs. Tone, they always manage to act pretty for their public.

Chip on His Shoulder

Bing Crosby's eldest son, Gary, has very definite ideas as to his attitude toward the new baby. When the youngest member of the clan was brought home from the hospital, Bing wanted to know what Gary thought of him. "I'll tell you one thing," Gary declared in no uncertain terms, "I'm going to be meaner to this guy than I was to the twins." It seems young Gary had his heart all set on a baby sister and he's that put out about it all.

The night of the "Goldwyn Follies" preview brought out everybody in Hollywood, it would seem. In fact, the lobby of the theatre was almost as star-studded as though it were an opening night. Andrea Leeds and Edgar Bergen arrived together with Charlie McCarthy sitting between them in the front seat of a baby Austin. Alfred Vanderbilt and Margaret Lindsay and Loretta Young and Jock Whitney made up a foresome while Jon Hall escorted Gertrude Niesen. Rudy Vallee made his entrance via the back door while Gloria Youngblood went in the front, but it was all right because they got together inside. They still seem to prefer each other.

TRICKS OF THE BEAUTY GAME

get has to do with bust'r trouble. "How can I develop, firm or otherwise improve my frontal contours?" That's a pet question, and just about the hardest one to answer honestly. For, truthfully speaking, you cannot regain the contours of Venus or who-have-you when the muscles have started to sag. You can improve matters and here is an exercise which is swell, backed up with a good uplift bra. If you have bozzom trouble, do not, I beg of you, wear the all-in-one type of foundation. No matter how excellently cut in other respects, there is a slight downward pull. Wear a girdle and separate bra. But the exercise—the exercise:

Sit on a backless chair or stool. Take a stick in your hands. Hands should be a little more than shoulder width apart. Rest the stick across your knees to start. Now bring the stick up over your head, arms straight, and at the same time, bring your legs up to right angle position with your body, knees stiff. Do it slowly. Now, legs still at right angle position, bring the stick down behind your head until it rests on your shoulders. Take two great big deep breaths in this position, and return to the start. The arm business is easy, but you must feel the pull in the chest muscles. The leg business is just to make things harder—to encourage proper balance and posture of the whole body, in other words.

Enough about the body beautiful for now. You know, if you work at it, you can have a figure as lovely as Jean Parker's and that's the tops! Here are some tips on types of hair, too.

Have you decided, as so many are doing, to let your hair grow? And is it just about getting you down, so that you think you'll go and have it whacked off again? Perhaps this notion may make life easier while you're making up your mind. If your hair is thick, and getting longish, and awfully hard to do up on curlers and things, get a hunk of electrician's wire. It's sturdy, but nice and pliable. That's something of a contradiction in terms, ain't it, but you know what I mean. Use it to make that neat roll at the back which, in spite of what is said about hair going up, is still a practical solution of the hair problem for every day. You can spread the hair out more across the back of the head with this beauty aid purloined from the hardware store. You can use it, too, to make a soft roll curl.

I know a girl who brushes the daylights out of her medium-brown hair every day, wears it parted in the middle and absolutely straight on top—and does it shine, with all that brushing—and she has this single roll curl slanting from a just-below-the-ear length at the sides to that little bone which you can find at the base of your neck.

Nobody seems ever to pay any attention to the girl with the too-curly hair—the kind that is next door to frizzy. I asked a good hairdresser about this problem, and he asked had I ever heard of the de-permanenting machine? Seems this will straighten hair some. I asked was it efficient and practical and he said, "We-e-ell, you have to keep right after it all the time and have professional hair sets once a week." Ennyhoo, I pass the information along if there is anybody in the audience who would be interested.

Miriam Hopkins, y'know, has exceedingly curly hair, though not frizzy, and in her latest picture, she had to wear an almost straight hairdo. Just a little soft curl on the ends was all the script allowed her. They gently brushed quite a lot of brilliantine into her hair, then ironed it down, also gently, with a stone cold curling iron, turning up the ends just the slightest bit. Another solution of the too-curly hair problem is to saturate it with plenty of waveset, push in waterwave combs at strategic points—very wide apart—and to let the combs stay in until the hair is absolutely dry, and then not to comb the hair out at all. The ends of the hair look well turned into soft ringlets, or, better still, cut rather short, and swirled to one side or the other.

This type of hair, too, will go up on top of the bean easily, since its tight curl gives it so much body and staying power. But if you decide on this type of coiffure, take your troubles to a professional hairdresser, have him or her cut and set your hair in a definite hairdo and return for a profesional set every ten days.

Speaking of cold curling irons, two handsome Hollywood blondes swear by this method of hair-beautifying—Carole Lombard and Madeleine Carroll. When Carole wants a rather definite curl, she uses a warm—not a hot iron. For the familiar Lombard bob, she uses the cold iron. Madeleine has a set every now and then, and keeps it looking nice by going over it with the cold iron.

ONE of our most delightful newcomers and seekers after stardom is Andrea Leeds. It was while she was doing a brief bit in "Come And Get It" some months ago that I met her, and I couldn't help noticing her eyelashes. "What, no false fringe?" I asked. She was as pleased as punch with the implied compliment, and said that when she was in her early teens, her lashes were thick enough, but so short they were completely lacking in glamor and she began putting dark eyelash grower on them, every single night of her life. She's still doing it, and the Leeds blinkers are unbelievably silky. The stimulation of creamy eyelash grower, as I've said time and again, will make lashes look more luxuriant than they are.

What else did I want to tell you about? Oh, yes. Have you ever noticed Luise Rainer's mouth? And Bette Davis' mouth? Both ladies' rosy lips are rounded at the corners. I was thinking, if you were dissatisfied with the shape of your mouche, and can't successfully improve it by the fashionable method of widening it at the bow, howz about getting a small artist's paint brush and practicing on the corners. You need a soft paste rouge to do this. Or you can scoop a hunk of your favorite lipstick out of its socket, for an experiment, and mix it up with a little tissue cream or vaseline. Be pretty sure of yourself before you barge out into the the waiting world with this innovation.

Do your ears stick out? Do you know what the male movie actors do, who are similarly affected—all except Mr. Gable, who just doesn't give a damn. They tape them back with adhesive tape.

Have you a slide-away chin? Put rouge right on the point of it, blending it in, of course.

Are you troubled with mean little hairs on your face, where the skin is too tender to use a dipilatory? Try bleaching them with a solution of peroxide and household ammonia. Use one part ammonia to ten parts peroxide, gradually increasing the strength until you have equal parts of each ingredient. When the hairs are pretty much bleached and dry, rub the spot gently with a pumice stone. Gradually, the peroxide and ammonia will weaken the annoying hairs and the rubbing with the pumice will break the hairs off, and pretty soon you'll only have to do a little dabbing with peroxide now and then to cope with this troublesome problem.

If the skin becomes irritated while the treatment is in process, stop for a couple of days, and apply a nourishing cream to the spots. No, Annabella—cream does not stimulate the growth of hair on the face. If it did, why wouldn't all the bald-headed men be using it, huh? The above home-made depillating process, by the way, isn't good for arms or legs. Use a regular depilatory there.

DO you want to add at least sixty per-cent to your charm and sex appeal? Then use perfume in the right way. I know—I know, you can't afford the best, so you'll not have any. But have you paid a visit to the perfume counter of your local five-and-dime recently? Have yuh seen the tiny little vials of very expensive perfume done up for ten cents? Only a drop or two of the precious fluid is contained in these vials, but that's all you need. Put it on furs whenever possible. On the lining of your best hat. On two thicknesses of flannel, sewn together, and sew the flannel to your dress.

Buy, also, the small flacons of toilet water. Find out about that scented paste which one rubs into the lining of bureau drawers. This is more expensive, but the scent lasts a whole year, on my honor, and smells up the lingerie, hankies, gloves and everything too booful for words. Take an atomizer and spritz perfume on your hair. Put it at the base of your neck, behind your ears, and on the palms of your hands if you can afford to put it where it must soon be scrubbed off. But don't put it on handkerchiefs or directly on your dresses—that ain't the way.

WHAT HAVE THEY—THAT YOU HAVEN'T?

knows enough to make the most of her opportunities. Going to schools in Marseilles, Madagascar, Budapest and Berlin, topped off with a session at art school in Paris gave the little Simone rare opportunities to observe people. She is always watching, making sly sketches of people that show how deftly she can indicate character in the turn of a head, the clutch of a hand.

The chief advantage of study for a screen star, Carole Lombard told me long ago, is that it teaches you to concentrate. Carole's formal education was a bit sketchy, but during that pain-wracked year when she was bedridden following an automobile accident, Carole read the sonnets and plays of Shakespeare. She read them with such intentness that without realizing what she was doing, she memorized long passages. So great was her concentration that she forgot her pain. Her roles nowadays are a far cry from the classics, but the concentration comes in handy. You can't let your mind wander when you are in front of the camera.

Let's assume that you have the grit and determination and curiosity to make you study all the time. What else do you need? Well, how are you on bounce? When Fate kicks you around, delivering one staggering blow after another to your pride, do you cringe and expect defeat, or do you live up to that Astaire gem that counselled "Pick yourself up, dust yourself off, and start all over again?"

IF ANY girl ever got ahead in pictures without heartbreaking disappointments, I never heard of her. Most girls you idolize are like rubber balls. The harder they are thrown down, the higher they bounce.

"But actresses must be sensitive," I can hear you saying.

Quite right. They must be responsive in order to project emotions, but they cannot allow themselves the extravagance of a trace of self pity. It isn't the emotions you feel, but what you can make others feel that make you a skilled actress. The fact that you cried all night after an old friend snubbed you, does not mean that you have the makings of a tragedy queen. When Bette Davis was thrown over by her first love, she settled down to work harder than ever. But often in pictures, by a mere shrug of her shoulders she has made you feel the impact of frustration, defeat.

How truthful are you to yourself? How about that double-rich chocolate malted you sneaked yesterday after your dieter's lunch of green salad and tea? And how about those towering-heeled pumps, a size too small, that you bought because they made your feet look cute? And as long as we're being mean about it, how about that habit of swinging your foot that you have always meant to stop, but just haven't?

The motion picture camera never goes in for day dreams. It tells the brutal truth. All your resolutions to carry out the beauty regime so wisely advised by Mary Marshall, all your determination to shed nervous habits, to have a more radiant and interested outlook on life wouldn't show on the screen. Only what you have accomplished can be caught by the camera.

Can you take criticism, or does it crush you?

Perhaps the toughest problem our screen favorites have solved for themselves is how to remain sensitive to constructive criticism and yet be unaffected by malicious attacks. If Rosalind Russell had taken it to heart when directors said that they would rather direct any instinctively-emotional little gutter-snipe than a blueblooded clam, she would not be in pictures today. Instead of shrinking from the directors who found her too coolly intelligent, she just gave them every chance to see how vivacious, how spirited she really is.

Simone Simon probably wished that she had never learned to understand English when the hammer-throwing brigade concentrated on her. Everyone granted that she was cunning as can be, a childish face with a Circe's seductiveness, but see her once and you have seen all, they insisted. Simone did not discard the provocative pout that is practically her trade-mark, but she is concentrating on study of a wide range of roles, comic and tragic, and on developing her singing voice. Say what you will about her today, she is determined to impress you by her versatility tomorrow.

Because Virginia Bruce has the most beautifully-serene manner, and because Carole Lombard was always so happy-go-lucky, they had "Just a dumb blonde" hurled at them from all sides. And Bette Davis, incredible as it may seem, was criticized for being limp and colorless.

Somewhere, tucked away in the most caustic criticism by people jealous of you, there may be a grain of truth. Look for it, don't just get riled and think up a crack to hurl back at them. The girls who get ahead in pictures are the ones who have learned to confound their critics by saying, "If what you say is true, perhaps you can suggest something that I can do to get over it."

If I haven't asked too much of you already, how is your confidence? I don't mean conceit, which is no more like confidence than tinsel is like silver, I mean assurance that makes it possible for you to ask for opportunities with the knowledge that you have done everything to train yourself to make the most of them. I am asking if you have convictions about yourself that are so strong that nothing that could happen to you could alter them. How would you feel at the end of a year like Bette Davis' first in Hollywood? Could you keep going confidently after all the producers at Universal said you could act but were a colorless little wren that no one would ever notice? Could you, like Carole Lombard, slam your hat rakishly on your head, say, "Never let it be said that Lombard was a bad loser," and go off to another studio bright as paint when a producer told you he was afraid to risk you in a leading role?

Maybe you could stand all that, and if you can I am proud of you, but how is your patience? After you had played a scene, getting the feel of it just right, and knowing that you could never feel so inspired again, could you repeat it ten—twenty—fifty times, one right after another?

I promised you a game of truth a while ago, and now is a good time to play it. Get five or six other attractive girls to play it with you and promise me that you will be absolutely ruthless with yourself and them. You would have to take ruthlessness in Hollywood, not from selected friends, but from strange producers, directors, costumers, make-up experts, newspaper critics and candid cameramen. Players don't live in a goldfish bowl in Hollywood. They live under a magnifying glass.

Now for our truth game. Write the names of the actresses I have been telling you about down on slips of paper, and in another column write your name and those of your fellow players. Allowing yourself only a minute or so, write down the word that immediately occurs to you as you glance at each name.

Here is the result from a playwright I just sprang it on, Rosalind Russell, pedigree; Virginia Bruce, compassion; Simone Simon, cunning; Bette Davis, gusto; Carole Lombard, sportsmanship. All very definite qualities, aren't they? Next I gave him the names of five young girls we know who are trying to get on the stage or in pictures and he wrote down, "Brittle, shy, vague, dissatisfied, and rebellious." Those girls have a lot of work to do on themselves, haven't they?

But suppose that you are a girl who makes a knockout impression the minute people meet you. Suppose you are the good little girl who eats her spinach and does her lessons, doesn't let failure get her down and looks herself straight in the mirror. Suppose you have endless determination, too, and you still aren't up with Bette and Rosalind and Simone in the marquee lights. And you aren't even doing too well on dates, to be candid about it.

Did anyone ever tell you that you are just like any of these girls we have been talking about—or like Janet Gaynor or Myrna Loy or any other favorite?

There's your answer.

Headliners are the one and only original of their kind. You just have to be individual, have to be gloriously yourself, to get anywhere.

HOW TO BE RUDE POLITELY

the train. If we missed it, there wasn't another along for an hour. It finally reached such fantastic proportions that we might have been seen by anyone who cared to look, and some did, skithering down the main street, hats and shoes and neckties draped over our arms. We always made it, though sometimes by a single finger, and would dangle from the car-step, thumbing our noses at the clock and feeling very pleased with ourselves.

"But that's being rudely rude, isn't it? However, I doubt if the clock minded. A clock, the one thing I should like to insult, seems singularly insensitive to insult. Where was I? At my morning grouch, I believe. Well, it begins when Theodore, the butler, calls me and says: 'It's seven o'clock, Mr. Powell.' Here we have a strange interlude. 'Shut up,' says my inner self. 'Never speak to me again. You're fired,' says my inner self. 'Chirp, chirp, tweet, tweet,' says my mouth, and I hang up.

"Then he pops in with the orange juice, all beaming and bright. Which in itself constitutes a grievance. 'What's he looking so cheerful about?'

"En route to the studio, I work up a fine new series of hates. For traffic signals, for pedestrians who insist on crossing the street, for other cars that presume to use the public highways. I scorch them with silent vitriol, which so relieves me that I am able to pause respectfully at traffic lights, to beam at pedestrians, to slink from the path of every horn that honks.

"And so I arrive. The gateman who is required to check me in says: 'Good morning, Mr. Powell,' which is fine, makes me feel he likes me, we're friends, fellow-workers, comrades and all that, two poor dubs who have to get up in the morning. I love that gateman, till he looks at the clock. Then my brotherly sentiments melt away. He becomes an enemy. I'm morally certain he's giving me none the best of it. I resent his audacity in looking at the clock at all. My impulse is to pop him one on the nose. I smother that impulse, look at the clock myself, and ask him the time. Inwardly I'm saying: 'Dare to cheat me by so much as a second, you so-and-so.' If it's six to nine and he calls out five to nine, I say thank you and depart, hurling silent anathema. If it's four to nine and he calls out five to nine, I say thank you and depart in adoration. I reach the set, ready to outglare any glarers, discover that no one pays the least attention to me, that, in fact, I'm on time. A mantle of peace descends. My bout of morning rudeness is concluded."

"What about afternoon and evening rudeness?" "I'm giving a practical demonstration now," he replied, slightly craning his neck from which he had just removed his stiff collar. "It's manners out of joint to remove your collar in the presence of a lady. Yet I am one who chafes at bonds. Both my soul and my throat crave freedom. Hence, I take you into my confidence. I disarm you with frankness. I implore you to understand that this is no affront to etiquette, but a passion for wide-open spaces. I say, in effect: 'With collar, I interview badly. Without, I'm not so hot,' no pun intended, but I manage. I attempt to take the curse from rudeness by offering cosiness instead. Let's take down our back hair, that's the general idea. I can bare my heart better when my neck is bare."

I inquired as to his procedure with autograph hunters. "Now that's really a problem," he said, "and I mean it seriously. I'm genuinely grateful to people who are good enough to like me. Only a pig wouldn't be. But there is also the instinct for self-preservation, not to mention the preservation of one's outer garments. When they come singly, I can handle them. When they come in numbers, I surrender the reins to a better man than I am, usually a member of our glorious publicity department, and let him take the rap.

"And that reminds me. We may as well get the topic of interviews off our chests. I'm sometimes asked to give them at lunchtime. I'm rude enough to refuse. And here we have another method of being rude politely—what is known as the transfer method. I don't enjoy giving interviews at lunchtime. They'll tell you round here that I sleep my lunchtime away. That's a canard. I use the time to gird up on my lines, excuse it, please, for the afternoon. But I can hardly use that as an excuse not to lunch with the press. I'd be told to gird up my lines the night before.

"Therefore I persuade you, I say to you for the sake of euphony, dear, dear, there I go again, you'd probably rather starve than have lunch with me. I persuade you then, the generic you, that you don't enjoy getting interviews at lunchtime, thus removing the onus from my shoulders to yours, and getting the reputation for being a good fellow at the same time.

"Then there's another interview problem to cope with. I am sometimes asked to discourse on such topics as how I enjoy being a midget, what it feels like to weigh four hundred pounds, thoughts of a man of twenty and so on. Now it happens that I've never been a midget, never weighed more than three hundred, and it's a year or two since I passed the age of twenty.

"Now I might of course simply mention these facts and bow my visitor out with what grace I could muster. That would be the logical course. It would also be the obviously rude one. I've engaged to spend an hour or two with the interviewer. I feel I owe him that hour. So when he asks me how I enjoy being a midget, I lean back, become brightly animated and say: 'How do you?'

"This may lead anywhere on up to giants, on down to fleas or on out to the lunatic asylum. It once led to a brisk and absorbing discussion on how it would feel to be a midget, twenty years old and weighing four hundred pounds. The point isn't where it leads, only that it should lead somewhere, to avoid the somewhat embarrassing alternative of having two people sit facing each other silently in a small room for an hour, at the end of which time they would rise, shake hands, to indicate there was no hard feeling, and separate.

"Possibilities there. You'd open a magazine and instead of seeing printed words, there would be a picture of me on one side, the interviewer on the other, both fish-eyed, and a lot of white space between. How's that for an angle? No? One can only offer his best. That's what I try to do. The man may come in for a midget story and depart with one on the high cost of kilowatts. That doesn't matter. The point is he's got a story. He's happy. I'm happy. The studio's happy. And the goose hangs high.

"By the way, have you got a story?"

dog, they kick him. And they're right!"

All those who knew Bette Davis before she climbed to fame agree that the underlying keynotes of her character were her determination to become an actress and her shyness. It is difficult for those who know Bette today to grasp the fact that she was painfully self-conscious, but it is true.

SHE first got the idea of going on the stage when she played the lead in one of the school plays at Cushing Academy. The principal of the school congratulated her, saying, "I hope, my dear, you will never think of taking up acting as a career." That gave her the idea of doing just that.

At first she took dancing lessons with Roshanara, but Frank Conroy encouraged her to give up dancing and try to get dramatic roles. Realizing that it would be a wonderful thing for her if she could be associated with Eva Le Gallienne even in unimportant roles, Bette went to Miss Le Gallienne and begged to be given a chance to play in the Civic Repertory Theatre. But she was so wretchedly nervous that when Miss Le Gallienne asked her to read some lines, she acquitted herself very badly.

It was then that Bette's mother, who believes that people ought to be allowed to follow the work they want to do in the world instead of being forced into conformity, suggested to Bette that she attend John Murray Anderson's dramatic school in New York. Though Mr. Anderson agreed to take her on as a student, she impressed those who met her at the time as very timid. "She was like something the rain had whipped," one man who knew her at the time said.

While she was attending dramatic school, James Light of the Provincetown Players, directed a school play, "The Famous Mrs. Fair." He liked Bette's work so much that he gave her a small part in a play the Provincetown Players were producing.

No one who met Bette today could possibly forget her. But in those days, it was altogether different.

"She was such a charming girl," Blanche Yurka told me, during a lull at a rehearsal for a play. One of Bette Davis' early roles on the stage was with Blanche Yurka's company.

"You know," Miss Yurka said, "in those days she was just an ingenue. The part she played in 'The Wild Duck,' was that of Hedwig, a wide-eyed innocent young woman. Bette seemed eminently suited to the part. She had such a soft face. I never dreamed in those days that she would play such roles as that of Mildred in 'Of Human Bondage' or the girl in 'Dangerous' or any of the vicious women she has since created on the screen. I never watch her that I do not marvel that the very quiet, subdued girl I knew can play such roles."

Oscar Serlin was one of the few people who saw the stamp of greatness on Bette. One day he saw her playing at the Provincetown Playhouse in "The Earth Between," a bitter, tempestuous drama of a farmer's unnatural love for his own daughter and the unholy means he took to keep the man who loved her away from her. With quiet conviction, Bette played the daughter.

And because Serlin had an unerring instinct for what makes greatness in the theatre, he decided that one day he would make use of her ability.

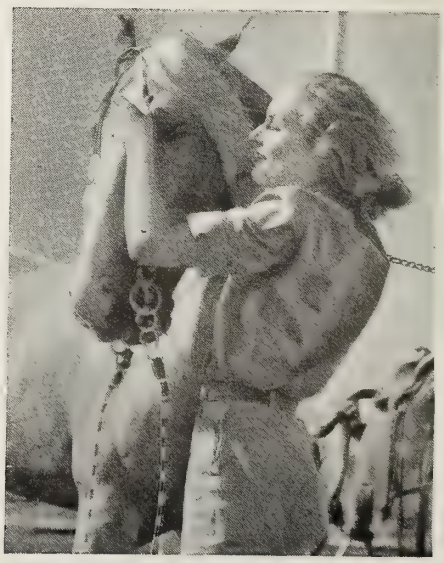
His chance came soon, when he decided to produce "Broken Dishes" in New York.

Bette was very humble and very grateful for this grand chance. But when she began to rehearse the role, she sensed an air of tension in the atmosphere. It didn't take her long to guess what caused it. Though Mr. Serlin believed in her, there were other people associated with him in the production of this play who did not like to stake the play's success on a player who had had so little experience as Bette. One day Bette learned that she might lose the role.

"Her reaction? It was a typical feminine reaction. She burst into tears," Mr. Serlin said, chuckling mildly.

For in those days Bette hadn't developed that elaborate defense mechanism.

"Don't worry, Bette," Serlin told her. "Everything will turn out all right."



And whenever his associates suggested getting someone else for the role, he told them that he was certain Bette could play the part. She was excellent!

To Serlin she said, "I'll never forget what you've done for me." And she hasn't.

One of the things that distinguishes Bette from the Margaret Sullavans and the Katharine Hepburns of Hollywood is the simple, honest quality of her gratitude. I was present once at a party which Bette attended in New York, where she greeted several press agents from the different companies. Each of them was anxious to remind her of how much his studio had done for her. In her warm, enthusiastic voice, she said to the man from RKO, "If it were not for your company and for the role I played in 'Of Human Bondage,' I'd be on the streets today. Nobody would want me."

Teddy Newton, who played the crippled young man in the the New York production of "Dead End," and who is one of Bette Davis' best friends, said of her: "During Bette's first year in Hollywood she was very unhappy. As everyone knows, she was put into roles for which she was very badly suited. Bette realized that if she kept on playing these roles her career might be ruined. She made up her mind to quit Hollywood."

About that time her sister Barbara began to suffer from a nervous breakdown occasioned by overstudy. Money for doctor bills was badly needed. So Bette, jeopardizing her own career, stayed on with Universal.

We give you a nifty pair of blondes—Carole Lombard and her Palomino gelding.

"You see, it's this way," he explained. "Bette, being a few years older than Barbara, has taken care of her financially. It was Bette who saw to it that when Barbara was of college age, she had her chance to go to college. Naturally, when Barbara was ill Bette wanted to do everything she could for her.

"As you might suspect, Barbara adores Bette. Last summer when Barbara eloped she chose Bette's wedding anniversary upon which to have her wedding in order that they might always have a double anniversary celebration.

BETTE is one of the kindest-hearted human beings I have ever met. When I first came to Hollywood a few years ago I was horribly lonesome. Then I met Bette and Harmon, and after that it was impossible to be lonely. They invited me to their home for week-ends, played golf with me, and treated me in general as if they'd known me all their lives."

Bette has given out very few interviews about her marriage, and a few of the Hollywood writers have been cruel and inaccurate in writing about it. I remember once how badly Bette was hurt when a writer said that she was supporting her husband, and that every time he bought her an orchid, he used her own money to buy it for her.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Shortly after Bette's marriage to Harmon, they separated and he went to New York just so that he could build up a reputation for himself as a musician. There were times in New York before Harmon proved himself as a musician when he was close to the verge of starvation. Times when he was lucky if he had a sandwich and a cup of coffee to sustain him in that tiny, cold, hall bedroom.

Bette knew nothing of all this. Wild horses wouldn't have dragged the information from Harmon. It wasn't until Harmon had returned to Bette that a friend told her the truth.

"Why didn't you tell me?" Bette asked him. But all the time she knew in her heart that if she had been in Harmon's place, she would have done the same thing. For these two mad, lovable children are strangely akin. Both of them have the same rigid New England conscience, the same hot pride. Even the crazy presents they give each other are alike.

Bette once bought Harmon a toy orchestra with four little men holding musical instruments made of wood. This toy was kept constantly on Harmon's night table, until one day Bette bought two pink elephants with phosphorus pin-points for eyes. Without Ham's knowing it, she took away the toy orchestra and put the elephants on the night table instead.

In the middle of the night Ham was suddenly aware of those elephant eyes blinking at him. He blinked right back. The elephants didn't disappear. He knew they had no right to be there, so he pretended they weren't.

Next morning he said to Bette, "Listen, darling, wait till I've really earned those D. T.'s by drinking and then those pink elephants will help to reform me," and he and Bette burst into a great gale of laughter.

It's because of these things that people who know her, feel like shaking Bette when she gives out an interview telling how hard-boiled and ruthless she is. Once she admitted, "My bark is worse than my bite. But I'm so constructed I cannot feel like saying anything about myself by way of praise. I would feel like a fool."

And so this story says it for her. It's high time Bette Davis was exposed.

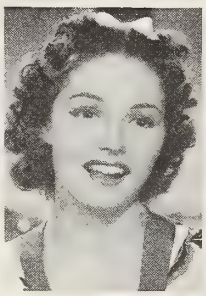
Happy Relief From Painful Backache

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.



The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

New Contract

Luise Rainer's new contract with M-G-M is really an achievement. She's been holding out against making any more movies until she was given permission to take five months a year off to do a play in New York. Metro, however, was scared of the idea after the floppolas of so many Hollywood stars on the New York stage. But perseverance won in the end and Luise has the kind of contract she wants and she's very happy, thank you. Chances are she'll appear in a play written for her by Hubby Clifford Odets.

forgotten her stockings. She wore a yellow sport suit with a black silk tailored waist. A small jaunty feather poked up from her coat lapel. The feather, being brown, failed to blend with any part of the outfit. It was a cute touch, but, like Patsy, pert, careless and a little wrong.

Her hair, straight on top, frizzed at the ends, falls out of place, thick, black, stringy. "I should do something about my permanent," she admitted. "I haven't had it washed or set in three weeks. Besides, I hate sitting under dryers. I leave that for the glamor girls.

"They tried to make me glamorous!" she shrieked, amused at the memory. "A make-up man worked three hours on my face, gave me false eyelashes, new eyebrows, everything. I thought I looked swell. You should have seen the rushes. I was worse than ever! So they gave up. A good thing too. It means I can get to the studio a couple of hours later than the glamor girls. All I do is slap powder on my face . . . and I'm ready. I just can't be beautiful."

IN discussing her work, I found nothing of the clown about Patsy Kelly.

"I'm slapstick, no matter what I play," she says. "When I have to register a serious love scene I look like a sick cow. Yes, I'm slapstick, but you can be slapstick without throwing a pie. I believe in contrast.

"Carole Lombard falling in the gutter is funny. If I do the same thing it means nothing. Let me trip in a place like the Waldorf-Astoria and that's a sure-fire laugh."

She confessed to working hard.

"Four years in Hollywood and I've worked in forty shorts and twenty features. Outside of three days last year, this is my first holiday. I motored from the coast with a friend. It took us ten days to cross the country. I discovered I still have a charmed life. I drove, and in trying to avoid running over a dog, bumped into a telegraph pole, turning the car completely over. Neither of us were hurt. In Texas I woke up one morning to see that one side of my face was swollen to twice its normal size. I didn't feel any pain so I figured the mirror was wrong! It wasn't. I had an abscessed tooth without pain . . . the charm again!

"You didn't follow suit," says Clarence Kolb to Patsy Kelly as they wait their turns before the camera of "Merrily We Live." As if Patsy didn't know!

Patsy is sincere and utterly natural. I arrived before the studio man and the press.

"I'm not used to all this fuss," she said. "I feel like a high school kid. I wish you'd stick with me."

While we waited we discussed the old days, when I was press agent for a Broadway show, Delmar's "Revels," which had, in its cast, an unknown youngster named Patsy Kelly. The unknown girl had to sing a song. It was one of those serious revue numbers, an excuse for show girls to parade up and down dressed as perfume bottles and jewelry. On one side of the stage sat Patsy Kelly with a singing partner. But she couldn't be serious.

"It was my sick cow look."

Anyway, the number was thrown out, only to appear in another revue, where, sung by Bill Robinson, it became the national hit known as "I Can't Give You Anything But Love."

"It's a wonder they didn't fire me for ruining that song," said Patsy. "That's what I mean by a charmed life."

And we continued to reminisce, I, recalling the first rehearsal day when I collected the names of the cast, and she had held out her hand and said, "It's Kelly to you."

"It still is," said Patsy.

"To your fans, too?"

"In spades!"

So, if you know your cards, you know that means double!

HOLLYWOOD HUSBAND

wondering if she should let herself be kissed. Though at the time, I didn't yet guess the reason for the way it hit me.

Then suddenly she was in high school, and a beauty. Her body took on graceful curves. Her eyes glowed with mystery. Her blue-black hair was under control.

I remember the night I became aware of all this. Mona had got the lead in her class play, and she'd asked me to be her escort for the evening. She was all excited, not only over the acting, but because there was to be a dance and supper.

Her mother, when I called at the house, told me, "She's almost ready." We heard the tap-tap of heels overhead.

Next moment I held my breath. This girl coming down was a princess. Her arms and throat, bare above the chiffon of her dress, were delicately veined marble. She walked with grace.

In her high-heeled slippers, she was taller than I. She made me feel clumsy. Humble, too. In the taxi, I said, "What made you pick on me, Mona? There must have been boys your own age, crazy to take you."

She said scornfully, "Oh, boys! They bore me! They are all right to dance with, but afterwards, I've nothing to say!" She snuggled against me. "But you're grown-up, you're almost the rock-of-ages."

The dark cloud of her hair was close to my lips. With an effort of will, I controlled myself. "Kidlet," I said gravely, "I hope you still mean that a couple of years from now. Because if you do, I'm going to ask you something."

Womanlike, she knew at once what I meant. Her eyes sparkled. "Ask me now!"

"No," I said, "You're too young. But some day, darling, I mean to ask you to be my wife."

Her eyes were shy now. "Oh, John, that's what I used to tell my dolls I'd be! John . . . " She held up her untouched lips to be kissed, and I asked myself what I'd done to deserve such luck.

A year later, I was graduating from medical school and Mona sat beside my father. Afterwards, Dad disappeared, leaving us the car. It was in that old car that I fastened my little pearl-studded fraternity pin on Mona's dress.

"But the waiting isn't over," I warned. "There's a year of interneship. Afterwards, even if Dad takes me in . . . "

She laughed tenderly. "I can wait."

Long engagements—empty days filled with nothing more substantial than dreams. Maybe the seed of our trouble was planted then, maybe Mona learned too well how to do without me.

An interneship isn't like medical school. It means a room in the hospital, hardly a day a man can call his own. I saw little of Mona and she grew restless. First thing I knew, she was looking for a job.

"I've alway had a passion for the stage," she said, "and now I mean to find out if I'm any good. Even bit parts pay a salary. I'll save it, so we can have a nest egg for a honeymoon."

How could I make an issue of her acting, then? And later, when she walked into a hit that played through summer, how could I object?

Fall came, and with it the break of my life. Even as a student, I had been interested in the problems of perfecting a new type of anaesthesia to help women in childbirth. At the hospital, I did some research which attracted attention. And now a world-famous specialist in Vienna wrote and invited me to work with him.

I was thrilled. I rushed to the theatre and tore into Mona's dressing room. "Darling," I cried, "how soon can you marry me? We're going to Europe on our honeymoon."

Mona was lovely about it, excited, but she didn't react as I'd hoped. "Vienna?" she said. "But what in the world would I do in Vienna? I'd be alone. Wouldn't even see you, because you'd be buried in the hospital."

"You mean, you won't come with me?"

She made it sound less harsh, but that's what she did mean. We argued about it uselessly. "Mona, if you loved me . . ." "And if you love me, John, you'd let me go on with the work I've learned to love."

I gave in. Mona said we'd waited so long, a few more years wouldn't matter. And I thought, "She's young. She's reluctant to be rushed into marriage." Since then I've wondered how our life might have turned out had I been stubborn.

The years did not fly, they crept. I buried myself among test tubes. Evenings, I wrote ardent letters to my touch-me-not girl. I called her the marble princess in the ivory tower.

She wrote back frequently, but through the tenderness of her words I sensed a new restless excitement. She had been in another hit. She made a short, very bad movie in the Eastern Studios—just for a lark. I went to see that movie in Vienna's newest picture house. The picture had been every bit as bad as Mona warned, but the leading man was handsome, and they seemed to enjoy their clinches.

I went home soon afterwards, but Mona wasn't at the pier to meet my boat. She was in Hollywood, having her first real fling at films. Dad told me about it. About the talent scout spotting her in a Broadway show.

At midnight I called Hollywood, not caring what it cost.

Mona's voice on the wire made my pulses throb. "Darling! I'll be home in three months. Oh, John, do you love me?"

I thought, three more months. Always waiting.

She did come home, on schedule. She flew. I met her at the airport. I couldn't believe that at last I held her in my arms.

"Beloved," I whispered, "I'll never let you leave me again! I've missed you so."

She said shakily. "I told them at the studio I wouldn't be back for a while."

That meant she was going back eventually. Mona still loved me, but she had had work she wanted to do and a purpose she wouldn't dream of relinquishing. And I couldn't help smiling at her glowing picture of the future. "Don't you see, John—I'll be making money. Some day it will grow into a research fund for you. Just think, me endowing my husband to do great deeds!"

How could she guess that some day this very love of hers would come near to destroying me!

We were married that same day.

I shan't tell you about our honeymoon. It belongs among those precious sacred memories one doesn't air. But in the end it was over, and Hollywood claimed my wife. She was as miserable about going as I was, yet eager, too. "Can't help it, Johnny darling. It's in my blood—and you're in my blood. Lord, what a tangled life I've picked for myself!"

Ah, Grace Bradley, we never would have guessed it. Slacks—to be sure!

PERTUSSIN
The "Moist-Throat" Method of Cough Relief

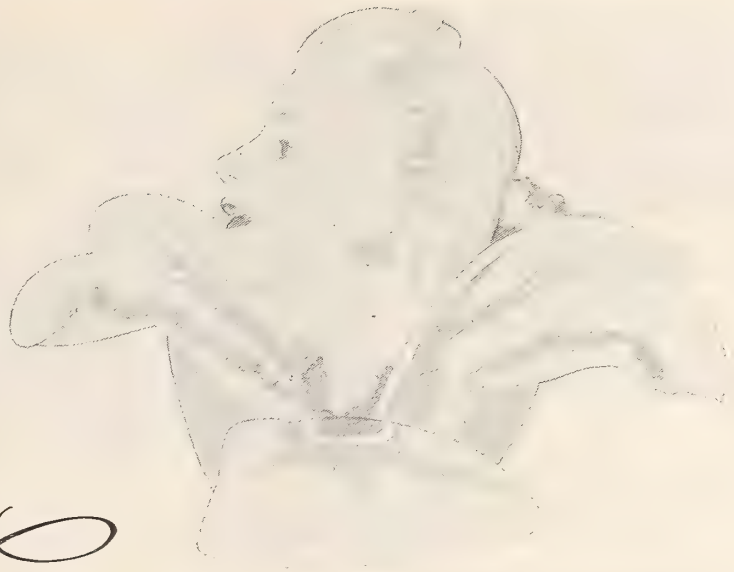
Between scenes for her latest picture Shirley Ross has a snack.

We didn't know yet how true that was. For Mona was headed now towards fame, a salary due to grow more fantastic every few months. And I? I was nothing but a good doctor who some day might be tops in his profession—within limits.

Again I was alone. But loneliness was harder to bear, for now I missed, not a dream girl, but a woman of flesh and blood. And jealousy began its insidious torment.

Mona flew east between pictures, and every time she tried to reassure me. "Darling, there's nothing to it! The studio insists I go places. After all, a girl can't go to the Brown Derby and the Troc and the races all by herself! The men who take me are good sports, but mainly they're canny." She explained, "They want to be seen too."

"I know, darling. I know motion pictures are a business like any other, and that you must follow rules. But how do I know you won't fall for your leading man?"



SHE was terribly hurt. "How can you even think of such a thing? After all these years when I haven't looked at any other man!"

Yet the fact remained I was nothing but a sandy-haired, average looking man gliding towards middle age, and I had no illusions about myself. If I'd had, my first visit to Mona in Hollywood would have dispelled them anyway. I shall never forget that visit, because it was like a bird's-eye view of our whole married life. I shall never forget the day I got there.

Like Mona, I flew across the continent. I couldn't afford it as easily as she, but I was impatient to be with her. I had expected her to come to me, but at the last moment she changed her plans. "Please," she'd written. "Please, darling. I'm so tired. And Malibu Beach will be heaven. Surely you can get away."

So I arranged with a colleague to take care of patients, handed over to him an operation which meant a thousand dollars. I didn't grudge any of it.

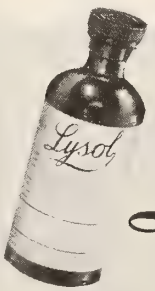
I remember thinking, as the plane circled over the airport, how clear and brilliant California sunshine really was. Then we were landing. I strained to pick my wife out in the crowd on the field, but she wasn't there. I was sick with disappointment.

Cleanliness IS PART OF LOVELINESS

The charm of attractive womanhood is made up of many things. Above all, a quality not to be measured merely by birthdays . . . a quality of fresh, sweetly fragrant daintiness, which proper care can assure at any age. With more accuracy than romance, let us call it frankly . . ."cleanliness". It means even more than bath-and-laundry cleanliness. It means that unsullied personal immaculacy which is the most compelling charm of a lovely young girl, and of truly happy wives. For no husband fails to notice, and resent, any neglect of intimate feminine cleanliness. Yet too many women never realize that the freshness, which is so natural in youth, requires constant care as maturity advances. A cleansing douche with "Lysol" disinfectant, in proper solution of water, is the frequent and regular feminine hygiene habit of fastidious modern women. They know that "Lysol" in solution cleanses thoroughly, deodorizes — dependably. Many hospitals use "Lysol"; many doctors recommend it for feminine hygiene. Complete directions are on every bottle . . . at any druggist's.

You must surely read these six reasons why "Lysol" is recommended for your intimate hygiene—to give you assurance of intimate cleanliness.

1—Non-Caustic . . . "Lysol", in the proper dilution, is gentle. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.



2—Effectiveness . . "Lysol" is a powerful germicide, active under practical conditions, effective in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.).

3—Spreading . . . "Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.

4—Economy . . . "Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs only about one cent an application in the proper dilution for feminine hygiene.

5—Odor . . . The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears after use.

6—Stability . . . "Lysol" keeps its full strength no matter how long it is kept, no matter how often it is uncorked.

The Mauch twins keep us guessing in "Penrod and His Twin Brother."

The usual detail of newspaper men and photographers looked us over and decided none of us were worth bothering with. They were turning away when a limousine drove up. Mona jumped out of it and ran towards me, calling my name.

"John! The studio called a conference and . . . Darling, will you forgive me for being late?" Instantly, the press snapped to attention. Cameras clicked. We were—or rather Mona was—the center of attention.

I wanted to ignore them. But Mona, having learned about the behavior of a young star, pacified me. "Sorry, sweet." She was nice to them. "I'd catch hell from the studio if I tried to high-hat the press."

Oh, it wasn't being kept out that burned me up! What does a doctor want with publicity, anyway? It was their attitude. How would you like to be told that for your own wife to be seen with you is bad business.

That whole visit was a nightmare. In the first place, Mona's week of rest was cancelled, so that on my very first day in the film capital she went to work. I went with her. She said it might be fun. Fun! Throughout the afternoon I stood watching her kiss the same man again and again while a director shouted, "More passion, Miss Carne!" Finally I walked away.

It did little good to tell myself that she didn't enjoy those kisses. But I never returned to the set. I said the lights hurt my eyes.

There were other things. There was the party Mona gave for me. A madhouse of extravagance. Everyone in the room was a Name, the huge off-white living room was a perfect setting for Names, and it was my wife's home and I was a stranger in it.

Oh, she tried to tell them I was the guest of honor, but I was only a movie star's husband. I had nothing to contribute to the talk. They talked shop, and the only shop talk I knew was science. Theories and formulas. Some day they might benefit humanity, but they are pretty deadly in a drawing room.

I left at the end of the week. It wasn't until I was back in New York, not until the hospital with which I'm connected telephoned for advice on an urgent case, that I began to feel my self-respect coming back. Oh, it was good to know I was useful, a necessary cog in the machine of life.

I made several visits to Hollywood after that, but mostly I tried to have Mona come to New York. "The commuting couple," columnists named us.

Mona's visits to me were more successful than mine to her, because in New York even a film star can be squired about without too much ballyhoo. But it wasn't like old times. I wanted to do sentimental things like taking a boat to Coney Island, like lunch at the Automat. Mona said that was out. "A star can't afford that kind of slumming. Besides, I'd be mobbed by autograph hunters!"

Oh yes, she was a full-fledged star now. Her salary had risen to five thousand dollars a week when, during a whole year of practice, I was lucky if I cleared ten!

WHAT could I offer her? The enormous star sapphire on her engagement finger she'd bought herself. It practically hid the platinum band I'd put there once. She said, "That's good. The public doesn't like to be reminded I'm an old married woman."

And yet, through all the misery, our love lived on. Each time we parted, we clung to each other like lost children. And it was sweet to know that I was as dear to my wife as she was to me.

Once she whispered, "You're still—my rock of ages. I don't know what I'd do without you. Everything else—Hollywood, success, fame—they're grand, of course. But only because you're there in the background, loving me. If ever I lose you, everything else will be—well, just the glitter that isn't gold."

If ever I lose you. . . . So she too was about sanitary napkins!

Here are the questions women asked:

Is there a way for me to secure greater Comfort and Security?

Suppose my needs differ on different days . . . what can I do?

What kind of deodorant should I use for positive protection?

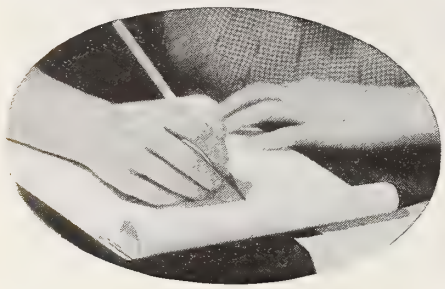
Here are the answers to your questions!

WOMEN know that the ideal sanitary napkin is one that can't chafe, can't fail, can't show. So, naturally, this was our goal. With the introduction of Wondersoft Kotex,* we were confident we had achieved it!

But to be honest, even though Wondersoft Kotex did create new standards of comfort and safety for most women, it did not completely satisfy every woman! Fortunately, we found out why . . . We discovered that one-size napkin will not do for every woman, any more than one-size hat, dress or pair of shoes. And, for many women, one-size napkin will not do for every day, for a woman's personal needs may differ on different days.

To meet this problem, we developed 3 types of Kotex . . . for different women, different days. Only Kotex has "All 3" . . . Regular Kotex, Junior Kotex, Super Kotex.

We sincerely believe that these 3 types of Kotex answer your demands for sanitary protection that meets your exact needs, each day. We urge you to try "All 3" next time, and see how they can bring you the greater comfort and security you seek.



Try all 3 types of Kotex, then judge for yourself. The proof is in the wearing! Perhaps you will decide you want one type for today, another for tomorrow—or maybe all 3 types for different times.

Quest is the new positive deodorant powder that is completely effective on sanitary napkins. Only 35c for the large size.

being tortured by that fear. I cried, "If only we needn't spend most of our lives apart! If only there were some way. . . ."

That's when she had an idea. "But John, maybe there is a way! A good doctor is necessary—wherever he happens to be. . . ."

I didn't understand at once. She went on, "Come to Hollywood. Open an office there. Even in Hollywood people get sick, you know. Why not?"

Why not, indeed? It was so simple we might have known there was a catch to it.

My father was frankly dubious. "A doctor should stick to the hospital where he's doing effective work. Do you want to become a fashionable dispenser of pills?"

We laughed, and since Dad believed you can't stop a man from making his own mistakes, he said no more. It wasn't six months before I acknowledged how right he'd been.

Because practice in Hollywood—and I was successful in a big way once the movie colony took up Mona Carne's husband as its official healer, was a farce. No time for days given freely to work in a clinic, now. No time for research. Instead, there were endless private calls, the kind a good doctor can easily settle over the telephone.

But the stars wanted attention, personal and undivided. They wanted flattery. And I, hating myself, gave it. Because I knew that if I didn't, they'd stop calling me in and then once again I'd only be a drag on Mona.

No, we didn't find happiness through living under the same roof. Mona still kept going out with more spectacular men. And while she danced, I'd go to the home of some other languid lady, summoned on an urgent call.

Half the time there was nothing the matter with the patient. "I've got the jitters, Dr. Murdock. What does science prescribe in a case like that. Could a cocktail for two be the cure?"

I writhed inwardly. At first I'd thought my own studies might be of some use, because stars are women too, and women have babies, and whether you're rich or poor the suffering is the same.

But even that wasn't so. They didn't have babies, they adopted them. The studios advised it. Why, a great star's time and popularity were too precious.

Once, I had dreamed that the crowning achievement of my career would be to help Mona bring our own son painlessly into the world. But she had other ideas. . . .

Can you understand that my nerves cracked under the strain? A doctor, like a musician or an engineer, requires constant practice of his best faculties. Mine were seedy. I became obsessed with a fear that if I were faced with some complicated case, I would fail.

MY father died, leaving me the big brownstone house in New York, and little else, except a touching letter of farewell. He ended it with these lines. "Remember, son, what a great poet said. 'To thine own self be true. Thou canst not then be false to any man.'"

I knew well what he meant. And Mona knew, too. Tears came into her eyes. "Oh John," she said. "It is true, isn't it? Everything's my fault. I've made you—be untrue—to yourself."

I took her in my arms and let her sob against my shoulder. Yet I couldn't find it in my heart to say the words which would have soothed her.

And then, like a bombshell, another letter came. It was from the famous specialist in Vienna whose pupil I had once been. He was coming to the United States, to work for several years in one of those imposing endowed institutions of science which are the wonder of the rest of the world.

He wanted me to work with him. He said, "You're a young man, John Murdock, and you will carry on where I leave off. There is so much to do, and not enough men to do it."

My big chance. Not much glory in it, certainly no money beyond a living wage. But oh, the thing every man wants most—achievement.

But there was the other side of the picture. Gone would be my comparative "equality" with my wife. No more expensive, shiny Hollywood doctor's office. No more jaunts across country at thousands of dollars a throw. Only work.

I showed that letter, also to my wife. We talked it over quietly. She cried desperately, "But John, where would there be, in your new life, room for—us? For me?"

I said gravely, "There's always room for you. You are my life." But she shook her head.

"No, if you go away, it'll be the end. Not at once, perhaps. But sometime. I feel it."

"And if I stay?" I asked her.

She buried her face in her hands. "I know," she moaned. "If you stay, it will be the end, too. You couldn't forgive me for keeping you to work that isn't worthy of you. And I don't think I could love a man who wasn't true to himself."

It is a week now since that letter has been lying on my desk. I don't know how to answer it. We've searched for the solution. Driving in the sunlight, we've tried to see into the future. Lying close in the night, we've tried. And always, we go round in a circle, and in the end the riddle is still the same.

If I turn down that offer, I'll become a Hollywood husband for good, a failure in my own mind. Mr. Mona Carne. If I accept it, it will mean the end of our marriage.

Because sooner or later Mona will slip away from me. She mayn't think so now. But glamor and success have their lure. Men will court her. And in the end one of them will win out. I might as well admit I know it.

What are we to do, then? Please write to me and tell me, you who read this! We've thought so much we can't think for ourselves any more! Have we reached an impasse? We're both career people, Mona and I. We both love our work. Should I sacrifice my own to hers? Can I be a man and do this? Perhaps your letters will decide for me, one way or another.

CLAUDETTE TAKES HER MEASUREMENTS

I said, "Let's unroll the tape measure and begin. You know, you measure a child every so often to take stock of development, if any. Why not a star? Let's begin with the face."

"Oh, let's not!" laughed Claudette. "You'll go deuces wild with that tape measure if you try to make my face conform to movie measurements with it. Experts have tried and failed. It needs a lot of doing, that's the bare fact about my face. Too broad across the eyes, too narrow across the chin. Nose wrong. I have no illusions about my face. I have to have careful lighting, careful make-up if I am trying to look glamorous, which I seldom am. I must play parts which call for changes of expression, vivacity, using the play and mobility of feature which will distract attention from the tape-measure deficiencies."

So the tape measure was out. It would get hopelessly snarled if used on Claudette. She doesn't match, and when you add up the contradictions, you have a provocative personality, all the more provocative because it cannot be card-indexed, tagged, trade-marked.

Claudette perceived the pitiful little wad into which the tape measure had been rolled and she helped me out. Which is also characteristic and the one undeniable consistency among the contradictions of Claudette, her desire to help out, her practicality when she does help out. As when someone is ill, for instance, some worker in the studio, perhaps. She doesn't spill over and send large gobs of fancy flowers. She sends bowls of strong soup, bottles of strengthening wine, things that will do substantial good, not just attract the eye, and the attention.

She doesn't spill over in any way. She will not discuss her husband, her marriage, her private life for publication. She doesn't spill over in her friendships, either. She doesn't spread her affections thinly, calling chance acquaintances "darling," inviting the crowd to "drop in, any time." She has never had an uninvited guest in her home. No one has ever just "dropped in." She invites her friends to come to dinner on Wednesday evening the 18th, at 8 o'clock and that is when they come, and only when they come.

And because contradictions embroider the firm foundation of the Colbert character, she is, also, informal. She likes to have daytime guests because they can play tennis, jump in the pool, be out of doors; she likes to wear slacks and forget make-up. She has only a few friends but the few are her intimate friends, without reservations. And she is fiercely loyal to them. A friend of Claudette's would just about have to run the gamut of sheer viciousness before she could be made to disbelieve in him, or her. She is "crazy about Carole Lombard"; she is "terribly fond of Roccy and Gary Cooper," a handful of others.

So, now, she came to my aid. She said, "I'll tell you one thing your tape measure would not have found in me, measure as it might, and that's an inferiority complex. I haven't one." She is, she added, awfully bored with inferiority complexes, with people, nine out of every ten, who announce that they suffer from this epidemic malady which is, one would assume, more common than the common cold. She said, "I never had a terrific inferiority at any time. I always knew that I would get along, whatever I did." (She still knows so. She is confident that, had she not gone on the stage but had, instead, done dress designing, as she planned, she would have been successful. For Claudette believes that if a person is at all successful, in any thing, it's reasonable to suppose that they have the stuff of success in them.)

"I did have a terrific shyness," Claudette was saying. "I was inhibited. I was stiff. I couldn't let myself go. That was the result of my French upbringing. For a French girl is, you know, trained never to show any emotion of any kind, for any reason. Naturally, when I was projected from that sheltered background plunk into the stage, of all places, I froze. More so when I first went into pictures. I felt so self-conscious. It seemed to me that I was living all my life, my most intimate moments and emotions, in front of a mirror.

IT has only been in the past four years that I have gained self-assurance. The parts I have had have helped, yes. 'The Gilded Lily,' 'Private Worlds,' 'Tovarich,' now this 'Bluebeard's Eighth Wife' are pictures which have contributed largely to my feeling of self-assurance. I know my job now. It is, after all, highly technical, and technique can be learned. The emotions you build, the reactions you try to get, are like pieces of a puzzle, and once you have learned the trick of putting the pieces together, you have that feeling of competency which is self-confidence.

"Does having achieved self-confidence mean that you never worry now?"

"No!" laughed Claudette, that rich silk laugh of hers, "I worry about everything. A curl out of place, the way a piece of furniture is placed on the set. I used to worry about my health, but having a doctor-husband takes care of that. They had a lot of fun with us on the set of 'Tovarich,' Charles Boyer and me, because Charles is, if anything, a better worrier than I am."

And here, again, a contradiction in the Colbert composite. For she is, she insists in the next breath, always optimistic about the future. She will always gamble with futures. She told how she onced moved from a small apartment into a very large, swank one without the faintest idea of where the next month's rent was coming from. But that was the next month. Something would turn up.

"I worry about my work now, today this hour," she said. "For the future, well, I know what I want to do. I'd like to be, on the screen, what Ina Claire is on the stage. I want to do the same sort of sophisticated comedy. For sophisticated comedy is ageless. And comedy is the only way, I believe, in which age can be bridged over. That's why I'm so pleased about 'Bluebeard's Eighth Wife.' It was one of Ina Claire's plays."

She is, she says, no business woman at all, again in spite of her fundamental practicality. She never sees her own checks, doesn't know the color of them. And as for lists of stocks, and income tax blanks and the like, they might as well, she laughed, "be the funny sheets!"

She enjoys fame and the rewards thereof, enjoys being recognized, applauded, as any normal, healthy-minded person does, if the truth is told. "I enjoy it," Claudette said, "except on the occasions, very rare, when I want to get away, let down my hair, have nothing on my face and can't do it." But even when she does go away she keeps her hair up, doesn't wear smoked glasses, doesn't try to palm herself off as Miss Brown from the Middle West.

SHE isn't temperamental. She does have a quick temper, and it is, she told me, "like milk soup, which boils up quickly and furiously and subsides just as immediately." She detests shopping for clothes . . . gets around it by buying an entire season's wardrobe at one time, in one place. She is extravagant only about houses, always has been. She has built her home in Bel Air, Georgian and gracious, and she says, "I go crazy, buying things for the house." Her hobby is 18th Century china, English, not French.

She is easily influenced by the moods of others. She is easily hurt, easily offended, supersensitive. She is more cynical than trusting. She says, "I never take people on faith. I am suspicious of everybody."

She is exacting with the people who work for her, fair but exacting, expecting them to know their jobs and to do them. She is equally exacting with herself. She isn't neat. She added, amused, "I'm terribly neat if somebody does it for me, and somebody always does. My mother has spoiled me in that way.

"I'm always late for appointments and I don't mean ten minutes late, either. I can't bear to be alone. I even invite someone to lunch with me here on the set every day because I can't be alone. I'm gregarious to the extent that I have to have someone with me all the time, one or two people, not a crowd. I'm a terribly routine person, too. I seldom go away. I haven't taken a trip in over four years. The trip Jack and I are about to take to Europe will be my first in four years."

And right here, Ernst Lubitsch came in, asked Claudette about the pronunciation of a French word, and said, "We are ready for rehearsal, please."

And Claudette, without a glance at the mirror, left, saying, "I think that if you had measured Lily Cauchoin, you would have found all of the same qualities, with the exception of the one—self-assurance.

ing as his favorite pastimes when not making pictures. He is idle very little of the time, however, since he crowds as many pictures into a year as possible. This, in closing, should be welcome news to his hosts of feminine admirers. He's still a bachelor!

We receive so many letters in this department from movie-struck fans who long for screen careers that we are taking space this month to give all of you a few plain facts about the situation. You might as well face the blunt and discouraging truth that only about one in ten thousand actually make the grade, unless backed by stage experience, dramatic coaching, personality and ability that has had public recognition, and, last but not least, the right connections. The Cinderella stories you read about are published merely because they are so unusual. Screen tests aren't available to the public and even if you were in Hollywood itself, your chances would be practically nil, since you wouldn't even get your nose inside a studio gate as an extra, unless you registered with Central Casting Bureau. This in itself is an impossibility these days, since their lists are so overcrowded already that they are not taking any new applicants. Far better for you to apply yourselves to something practical and forget the day dreams. Hollywood is full of beautiful, inexperienced, hopeful girls and boys who feel all they need is a chance. But they won't get that chance, and in the meantime, they're all but starving.

L. Dalling, Chicago, Ill. The list you refer to appeared in the June, 1937, issue of MODERN SCREEN. If you will send ten cents to our subscription department, the magazine will be mailed to you.

Mary Gowska, Scranton, Pa. A brief story of Gene Autry's life appeared in the July, 1937, issue of MODERN SCREEN. We will be glad to mail you a copy if you will send ten cents to our subscription department. Sorry not to have been able to answer you before this.

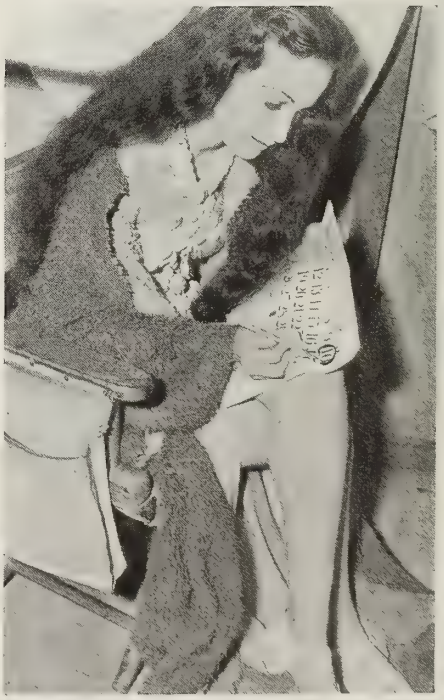
Barbara Hunn, Parma, Mich. Fredric March is very much married to Florence Eldredge. His latest picture is "The Buccaneer." A letter addressed to him in care of United Artists Studio, Hollywood, Cal. will reach him. He is forty years old.

Leah Kaufman, Pittsburgh, Pa. Since your letter is one of many showing a misunderstanding in regard to our printing biographies of stars, we hope this answer will explain the matter to everyone's satisfaction. Each month this department prints, in MODERN SCREEN, several brief life stories, chosen according to the number of requests sent in. Once a biography has been printed, that particular life story is not reprinted for six months, thus allowing for greater variety. In no instance do we mail out life stories of the stars, free of charge or otherwise. It is entirely a feature of the Information Desk carried each month in the magazine and dictated by requests sent in by our readers.

Marjorie Lee, Memphis, Tenn. The cover of Shirley Temple which you refer to was on the May, 1936, issue of MODERN SCREEN. If you will send ten cents to our subscription department we will be glad to mail you a copy of that issue.

Minnie Wolfevitch, Montreal, Que. Nelson Eddy was born in Providence, R. I. in 1901.

Eleanor Meyer, New York, N. Y. James Cagney's next picture will be "Angels With Dirty Faces." At this writing, no leading lady has been chosen. Address Mr. Cagney in care of Warner Bros. Studios, Burbank, Cal.



Max Jones, New Zealand. We do not furnish photographs through the magazine. However, if you write to Eleanor Powell in care of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal., requesting her picture, you will receive one. But be sure to enclose twenty-five cents to cover mailing costs.

Harris Huerth, St. Paul, Minn. There is a tentative deal in the air which may bring Jessie Matthews to this country in the very near future to make a picture for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Her latest English release is "Sailing Along" with Jack Whiting and Roland Young.

Sylvia Kaylor, Brooklyn, N. Y. In printing life stories we try to answer the requests of our readers according to the numbers received each month. Don't lose patience, your favorite's biography will appear soon.

Muriel Haddon, Dobbs Ferry, N. Y. Tony Martin's latest picture release is "Sally, Irene and Mary," in which he plays opposite his wife, Alice Faye.

Thyony Theofiler, Houston, Tex. Gene Autry is thirty years old, weighs one hundred and sixty-five pounds and is five feet ten inches tall. He is married to Ina Mae Spiney.

Elmer Schule, St. Albans, N. Y. As far as we know, Deanna Durbin has made no plans to appear in a New York stage play. Her latest picture release is "Mad About Music."

F. V. Navascues, Philippine Islands. Sorry, the only address we can furnish you with for Deanna Durbin is care of Universal Studios, Universal City, California.

Anne Rust, New York, N. Y. Nelson Eddy's current release, as you know, is "Rosalie." "The Girl Of The Golden West" will probably be released late this month or next. Mr. Eddy is not a ladies' man, but seems to prefer his own company, or that of his mother, who is usually his companion at openings and previews.

Jeane Evans, Springfield, O. It is true that Clara Bow has talked about making a screen comeback but at the present time she is awaiting a visit from the stork and has temporarily abandoned thoughts of her career. Sorry, but we cannot furnish you with her personal address through this column. At this writing, the first ranking five male stars include, in order of their importance, Nelson Eddy, Gene Autry, Errol Flynn, Tyrone Power and Robert Taylor.

Nelda Thomas, Sacramento, Cal. Yes, Tony Martin and Alice Faye were both in "You Can't Have Everything." The Ritz Brothers are just that . . . brothers. "Rosalie" is Eleanor Powell's latest picture.

Barnadine A. Schulte, Philadelphia, Pa. Address Ronald Colman care of United Artists Studio, Hollywood, Cal., and enclose twenty-five cents to cover mailing costs of the photograph. If you'll read through this column you'll find other addresses given to cover your questions.

Grace Ruby, Clayton, Mo. In spite of what you have read, Errol Flynn happens to be the young man's correct name and don't let anybody tell you differently.

Richard Storey, New Orleans, La. Jane Bryan is under contract to Warner Brothers Studio, Burbank, Cal., where you may address her. The stars do read their own fan mail so she will see your letter. She was born Jane O'Brien in Hollywood on June 11, 1918. She's five feet three inches tall, weighs a hundred and thirteen pounds, has gray eyes and light brown hair.

Anthony Parker, Denham Springs, La. You can get Frances Langford's picture by writing to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal. She is twenty-two years old, unmarried and at this writing not set for her next picture as yet.

Virginia Novak, Seymour, Conn. Eleanor Powell plays opposite Nelson Eddy in "Rosalie."

Margery Green, Philadelphia, Pa. Yes, you are right. Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald are set to play opposite each other in "Girl Of The Golden West."

Claire Trevor and Michael Whelan enjoy a chat on the set of "Walking Down Broadway."

Emogene Savage, Indianapolis, Ind. If you write Norma Shearer at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal., and enclose twenty-five cents with your request for her picture, she'll send it to you and it will be autographed by her.

Rosemarie Schwartz, Trenton, N. J. Address Ramon Novarro in care of Republic Pictures, Hollywood, Cal.

Marlis Nilsen, Shadehill, S. D. Jack Oakie's friend who died was Bill Boyd, the stage actor. There is another Bill Boyd in the movies, you know, and he is the one whose marriage you saw announced.

Betty May Keller, Philadelphia, Pa. Sonja Henie was born on April 8, 1913 in Oslo, Norway.

Florence Kaye, Pittsburgh, Pa. Alice Faye's newest picture is "Sally, Irene and Mary." Yep, it's a musical and Hubby Tony Martin is with her in it.

Acting is as effortless for her as breathing. In the family O'Brien (Jane's name was changed to Bryan by Warners to avoid confusion with Pat O'Brien on theatre marquees), there is no trace of that histrionic urge which possesses Jane. Unless her mother's flare for elocution might have a suggestion of it.

LONG before Jane was into her teens, her parents recognized that they had an embryo actress on their hands. Even the three younger brothers early realized that this sister of theirs was something very special.

It must be the singular alchemy of the Gaelic blood which drove Jane relentlessly in her single-track devotion to the stage. For never once in all her nineteen years has Jane swerved from her one ambition to be an actress.

Very recently May Robson said to her, "What would you do if you had to give up acting?"

"I wouldn't give up acting," was Jane's definite reply.

Jane is shy and hesitant as she discusses her brief past and her schoolday venturings into drama.

"Those performances in the attic went on for years," she recalls. "The plays were extemporaneous and it depended on my mood whether I was the princess in the tower, the villain who held her there, or the hero who rescued her. Mother stopped worrying about my periodic disappearances eventually. She knew that I was off somewhere strutting on imaginary stages and reducing phantom audiences to inarticulate admiration of my performance.

"I was in a class play or two at Marymount Convent, but important vistas opened to me when I entered University High School. Here were drama classes, a dramatic coach, plays to be given, scenery to be painted—in short, the theatre.

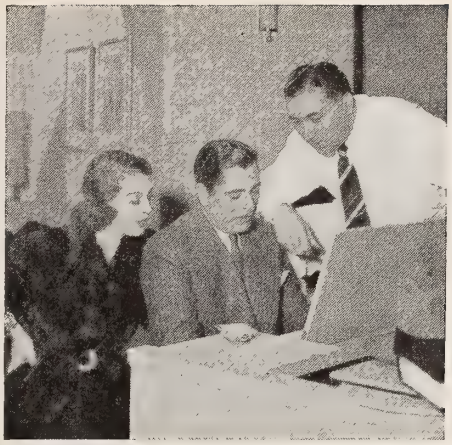
"The only trouble was that I always talked out of turn. I'd be chosen for an important part in a play, and then the coach and I would disagree as to the interpretation of the role. Or perhaps I felt the timing was wrong in the delivery of lines.

"I would wave my hands and scream, 'It shouldn't be done that way, it isn't right,' and before I knew it, someone else was in my part, and I found myself making the announcements before the curtain went up.

"When high school was over, I thought to myself, 'Now at last, I can go out and be an actress.' I had only vague notions of how I was going to do it, but I thought a good beginning would be with a term in some good dramatic school.

"Very gently I made the suggestion to the family. But my mother and dad had other plans for me. They felt that a course at the University, which was within a stone's throw of our house, was indicated.

"So we made a bargain. I lacked half a credit in algebra for University admission. If I would work off that required entrance credit, I could also at the same time attend Jean Muir's experimental theatre. I would have six whole months to test myself. If no exceptional talents were discovered by the teachers in that time, I was to be a good girl and go on with my education."



So in exchange for that one hour of drudgery at algebra, Jane received the fulsome delight of classes in drama, dancing and fencing, stage-setting and costuming. Miss Muir's school had an excellent staff, and Jane received invaluable training.

IN February of 1936, "Green Grow the Lilacs" was chosen by the Theatre Workshop for presentation. Lynn Riggs, the author, was in Hollywood, under contract to a major studio, and he was sufficiently interested to undertake the direction of his own play.

Jane O'Brien was cast in an important role!

In deference to the playwright and Miss Muir, the audience was star-studded. Among those attending was Bette Davis. In reality it was Fate sharing a seat with Bette.

The following morning she went to Max

One of the most accomplished musicians in Hollywood, Warner Baxter, entertains Loretta Young and Director Walter Lang at the piano.

Arnow, then casting director at Warners and said, "I wish you'd go down to Jean Muir's school. They're giving 'Green Grow the Lilacs.' There's a girl called Jane O'Brien in it. She's a natural, if I've ever seen one."

Mr. Arnow promptly attended. No possible bets are ever passed up in Hollywood by talent scouts and casting directors.

A week later, Jane was invited to make a screen test. She chose the love scene from "Green Grow the Lilacs." And on March 9, 1936, she signed a long-term contract. But before becoming a full-time actress, Jane finished her algebra and her workshop course.

"If things didn't work out," she says, "I wanted to be able to have that algebra credit so I could go to college. Otherwise, I wouldn't have kept my part of the bargain with Dad and Mother."

Jane was cast in two pictures in unimportant roles. Did this child really have it? Was she really a natural actress? Did she possess that undefinable, intangible quality which every fine actress must have?

In her first few days on the set, she proved that she had it. She took to acting before the camera like a duck to water.

Long before "Marked Woman" was released, in which she played the role of Bette Davis' younger sister, Bette said to me, "There is a girl whom you must know. She is one of those rare things, a natural actress. Watch her.

"She goes into a scene as if she were hypnotized; as if she were following directions, taking orders from some unseen power. It's uncanny."

Jane is still wide-eyed with delight at her break and she is now intent on justifying the faith of the studio and her sponsors in her.

"I hope I'll be given a lot of little sister roles," she declares. "I prefer not to carry the love interest in a picture, for I still don't believe I'm sufficiently mature emotionally to do it."

Her special request now is, "No love, please," applied equally to her personal life and her screen life.

Her interests are diverse. Reading, tennis and walking and hunting, with Phil Kellogg, a cutter on her home lot, as her companion.

Jane's special enthusiasm centers around her three brothers: Jim, seventeen, Billie, fourteen, and Don, eleven. "Billie," she confides, "is going to be a real actor some day. He has that special something."

Mary Garden visits MacDonald on the set of "Girl of The Golden West," the musical score of which is said to be sumpin'!

The only drawback to the young brothers is that their important activities keep Jane broke buying uniforms or footballs or camp paraphernalia for whole groups at a time.

"And then I have to borrow from the boys for my own spendin' change. But I have to pay it back the following week—so there's no week when I'm not financially embarrassed."

In a town indifferent to its local talent, Jane Bryan, a Los Angeles product living in the shadow of motion picture studios—daughter of a prominent attorney—has through luck and talent made an excellent bid for fame!

More Drama For Claire

I saw a grand picture, "Dead End". I saw those boys make those "Dead End" hoodlums startlingly real, Joel McCrea ignite another brilliant light along his movie road of success, Sylvia Sydney add another impressive portrayal to her preceding ones as did Humphrey Bogart. But I also saw an actress do with her tiny role what the stars did with theirs. I mean Claire Trevor as Francey.

I've seen Claire in numerous films before, but her roles never allowed the verve she put into her performance as Francey. At last a part, if small, into which she could get her teeth and prove she is as good as Hollywood's best dramatic stars!

Claire should no longer be cast in support to some star but as the star in a Class A production like "Dead End". The emotion and vitality she put into Francey should be rewarded with a starring role for Claire.—Josephine Crutcher, So. Boca Grande, Florida.

Shirley, the Kid Sister

Ever since the day I made public my admiration for Shirley Temple, I have been the victim of an abundance of kidding. I pretend to be able to take it but inside it hurts. Because in kidding me, my friends say things about her that to me seem mean.

Being a lad in my late teens, I regard Shirley as I would a kid sister. My love for her is something far deeper than mere fan worship. I like to imagine her as one of my dearest friends because I feel that I know her as well as anyone. Whenever I read or hear mean and catty little things about her I wonder how people can possibly have any love in their hearts and still criticize the little girl who stands for everything that is good and right.

Her beauty, ability and genius are something for the whole world to love and respect, as I do. But Shirley, as a little child I have prayed to some day walk and talk with as a true friend, is the little girl I have grown to love.—Bill Dawkins, St. Albans, N. Y.

Turn to our Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. It's a valuable guide in choosing entertainment. Instead of giving the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

Beautiful, blue-eyed and blonde, Phyllis Brooks proves Hollywood is sometimes very slow to recognize talent. Phyllis was a model for several noted artists until her picture in a toothpaste advertisement caught the eye of film scouts who gave her a screen test. The roles that fell her way dissatisfied Phyl, and, refusing a renewal of her screen contract, she left for New York and the stage. She was given the coveted role of second lead in the Broadway production of "Stage Door". The favorable criticism she received again brought a film contract—this time with 20th Century-Fox. And now, watch Miss B, for she's rocketing to stardom. Her new picture is "Walking Down Broadway".

There was a time when Stu Erwin wanted to be tall, dark and handsome—but he's over that now!

BRIGHT BOY

But instead of a hayseed shuffling to meet him, Mr. Sheehan was met by a good-looking young man with keen grey eyes and wearing excellently tailored clothes.

"Why—why," stammered Sheehan, "I came to offer you the role of the hammiest hick that ever saw celluloid, but how would you like the romantic lead?"

"Thanks a lot," he said, "I'd rather be the goof. I like those guys!"

That was nine years ago—but today you would have as big a surprise as Mr. Sheehan—were Stu Erwin pointed out to you.

You would probably recognize Mrs. Erwin first, for she looks like the movie star she used to be. That same delicate beauty which was June Collyer's alone.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up." Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. 25c at all drug stores. Stubbornly refuse anything else.

meet Stu Erwin you would find he has a charm that is friendly and direct.

If you were twice as lucky and had a chance to visit him in his home, you would find your first impression backed up a hundred per cent. More than likely the door of that hospitable, rambling Spanish home would be opened by Stu himself. The whole house breathes the spirit of hospitality right to the "play-house" at the back where you would probably be taken for some fun. Maybe it would be for games with the children, around whom the lives of June and Stu revolve. There's Bill, who's almost six. Bill is really named Stu, Jr., and his dark eyes hold the same twinkle as the eyes of his famous dad. June Dorothea is three.

Or perhaps it would just be chatting and sipping a drink in front of the huge, open fireplace of the comfortable room.

You'd certainly hear about Stu's prize-winning dogs. He has two bulldogs, a Doberman Pinscher and six scotties—one of which, Craghaven Clinker, is a national champion. "And being in the dog house isn't half bad," Stu will tell you. "My purps have showerbaths, sunmachines, private rooms and a special patio in theirs."

AND you might hear of the latest shopping expedition which Stu and June went on. June loves clothes—and Stu, believe it or not, could win Hollywood's Best Dressed Man contest if he bothered to enter the race. You'd probably hear about Santa Anita, and the gay places they had been lately. For they're beautifully ballanced people, these Erwins, believing in enjoying the world as much as they do the contentment of home.

And particularly you'd love the stories which Stu tells on himself and on his favorite actress, June Collyer. Which brings to mind one which June told us once on her favorite actor. Stu had been telling about visiting Bill in kindergarten. "This modern education gets me," he said. "The curriculum for children seems to consist of drinking orange juice, taking naps and playing games and then drinking more orange juice. It's no doubt all right, but methods have certainly changed since my day."

"Perhaps it's just as well," mused Mrs. Erwin, and then told this experience of Stu's with the educational methods of his day. Stu was in fourth grade at the time, and his teacher just couldn't break him of the habit of saying "I have went home." She told Stu to remain after school and write on the blackboard "I have gone home" one hundred times. Having finished the assignment, Stu left a note on the desk. "Dear Teacher. I followed your instructions. And I have went home. Stuart."

Stu gave his first Hollywood party, oddly enough, in New York City. It was eight years ago, on his first trip there. He had only a tiny apartment rented for his stay, and after fitting chairs up to the table, decided he could invite twenty. Ninety arrived. Victor Moore, playing in a musical show at the time, brought his whole company!

Stu is as unaffected as was Will Rogers —to whom he bears a striking resemblance in manner and philosophy. There is the same easy acceptance of human frailties, the kind-hearted twist to every observation.

Will Rogers wasn't afraid to be simple, either. Only men of big hearts dare to pass up the affectations and emphasize the humanness of their characters. Will Rogers knew that people loved his homely heart. And Stu Erwin knows that long ago he was right in charting his course along the route that was honestly human. The years since have proved it—and the years to come will bring more evidence to play on the fact that Stu Erwin was smart when he chose to be dumb.

"Emoting to order" is a real strain on the throat. That's why an actress thinks twice before choosing a cigarette. Miss Colbert says: "After experimenting, I'm convinced that my throat is safest with Luckies."

Ask a tobacco expert why Luckies are so easy on the throat. He'll undoubtedly explain that the choice tobacco Lucky Strike buys, makes for a light smoke. And he may add that the exclusive "Toasting" process takes out certain irritants found in all tobacco.

Here's the experts' actual verdict... Sworn records show that, among independent tobacco experts not connected with any cigarette manufacturer, Luckies have twice as many exclusive smokers as all other brands combined.

Unhappy Sally! She is good-looking, good company—yet many an evening she spends alone, reading magazines! (Men won't call the girl who has a dull, unattractive smile!)

Only seven—but Janet could tell Aunt Sally how easy it is to have a lovelier smile! (Janet knows more than lots of grown-ups—she's learned in school the value of gum massage.)

Sally's life could be so happy! She'd have plenty of dates, she'd win romance—if she'd learn how irresistible men find a radiant smile! (Sally should try Ipana with massage, for dental science teaches that gums as well as teeth need special care.)

Does your mirror tell you—

"A Lovelier Smile would make you more attractive!"

A GAY, friendly smile, revealing sparkling teeth, is so appealing. The girl who has a lovely smile can't help but win! Tragic that so many girls lose this charm through carelessness—tragic that they neglect the warning of "pink tooth brush"—let teeth that are lustreless and dull actually spoil their own good looks!

If you've seen a tinge of "pink," see your dentist. It may be nothing serious, but let him decide. Usually, however, he'll tell you that it's only another case of gums deprived of exercise by our modern, creamy foods. And, as so many dentists do, he'll probably advise more work and resistance—the healthful stimulation of Ipana and massage.

For Ipana, with massage, is especially designed to help keep gums healthy, as well as keep teeth sparkling. Every time you brush your teeth, massage a little extra Ipana into your gums. As circulation in the gum tissues increases, gums tend to become firmer, more resistant to trouble.

Change to Ipana and massage—and change today! Let this very practical dental health routine help you to have firmer gums, brighter teeth—a lovelier smile!

THE PUNCH THAT'S JUDY

BY ROBERT McILWAINE

IF YOU can't be terrific, then don't try at all," advises Judy's sister.

There are three Garland girls, but it took the very youngest member of the trio to deliver the punch that rang the gong of fame.

Judy has only been around fourteen years, but she's made each and every one of 'em count. Born in Murfreesboro, Tennessee, Miss Garland had only seen two summers when she embarked upon the road to success. It seems that during a Christmas performance, little Judy was allowed to speak her piece—or sing it.

"I wanted to sing, so they let me go on for one verse of 'Jingle Bells.' Finally, I was coaxed off after about ten stanzas and I guess I'd still be there if they hadn't used a little force with their persuasion. One reason I got away with it all might be because Dad owned the theatre," explained Judy.

Even at this tender age, Judy had plenty of punch and was the type that, given an inch, invariably took a mile. Perhaps this is one of the reasons she is a star today.

Recently the Garlands visited New York and Judy made personal appearances. We saw her backstage in her dressing-room. The happy youngster was surrounded by flowers, make-up and costumes equal to any prima donna's, but featured none of the formalities of a lady warbler. Curled up in a comfortable chair, Judy was busily engaged doing her lessons for next day. It seems that during her brief sojourn in the East she was accompanied by a tutor. He had gone to the country, but left a little reminder behind. It read: "Since we did not cover the French verbs today, will see you tomorrow (Saturday). Please be prepared."

Even though Judy's mother and sister are usually present, little Miss G. does her own talking. She is smart and poised without being precocious, and her vivacious personality is a factor of her extreme popularity.

Between her studies and the five-a-day at a Broadway theatre, she had managed to see her boss's doctor—just in case. (Continued on page 14)

Miss Garland's favorite gentleman friend is Mr. Mickey Rooney.

The youngest of the Garlands is the peppiest. She's into everything.

SHE'S ONLY BEEN AROUND FOURTEEN YEARS, BUT, OH, HOW SHE'S MADE 'EM COUNT

FRENCH FOR DELICIOUS

BY MARJORIE DEEN

Oo! la! la! you'll adore Simone's pet strawberry pie!

In the words of the popular song, "Spring Is in the Air!" Yes, in the florists' windows as well as in the gardens, on the fashion pages as well as in the shops, everything helps to back up the calendar's contention that once again, definitely, officially (and happily) it's spring. In our culinary department, too, the season has us, it seems. For here—as timely as the robins, as cheery as the daffodils—are Simone Simon's suggestions for the sort of dainty fare that will serve as a spring tonic for your menus, lifting them out of the winter doldrums into the realm of the unusual.

But wait a bit! Did that word "unusual" throw you for a minute? Well, it needn't. For though the foods Simone recommended have a French "accent" as intriguing as her own, the recipes specify no strange ingredients that you never heard of. Nor do they call for rare viands difficult for anyone except a linguist or a world traveler to procure. Indeed not, for as with most French cooking, it is the combination of foods, the delicacy of flavoring and above all the excellence of the sauces that give distinction to the dish and serve to prove, to even the most skeptical, that France is richly entitled to the culinary laurels she wears so proudly.

So says Simone, at any rate. Furthermore, she went on to prove her point by providing us with two or three well chosen recipes. Who, then, are we to argue? We can far better profit by following her directions for preparing Petits Pois Nouveaux à la Francaise, Poulet à la Façon de Simone and Omelette aux Fraises. Which, my pets, in plain English is simply new peas fixed delectably in the French fashion, chicken cooked according to Simone's favorite recipe and a strawberry omelet that will delight all who try it, whether it is served as a main course luncheon dish or as a dessert.

Nor must we overlook another dessert treat for which Simone expressed real enthusiasm, even though it bears no fancy French title. It's Strawberry Chiffon Pie! And it's as spring-like a sweet as one could imagine, according to our piquante little star who was first introduced to this light, frothy concoction at the Café de Paris (20th Century-Fox's own restaurant) during the making of "Josette." From now on, Simone assures me, she will order the season's most popular fruit in this form whenever it appears on their menu.

So, with this assurance, I lost no time in getting the recipe to add to the others she had provided. I was also fortunate in being able to procure a picture that would give you some idea of what this pie looks like when made according to the directions that I'm passing along here for all of you to try. Unfortunately, no picture in black and white could do justice to the delicate color that adds so much to the appeal of the dessert in question.

Piquant and French, Simone Simon loves unusual delicacies.

Here, then, you'll find this and other recipes for Simone Simon's favorite foods, carefully tested and simple enough for all to follow. So get busy with the scissors or the pencil (you see, I take it for granted you will want to keep copies!) and try these French dishes. In so doing you'll discover for yourself just what the French word for delicious—which is delicieux, by the way—really means!

NEW PEAS, FRENCH STYLE

2 tablespoons butter
6 small white "pickling" onions
2 cups shelled, tender young peas
1 head hearts of lettuce
½ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar
2 tablespoon water (or, preferably, chicken broth)

Melt butter in a heavy saucepan or Dutch oven. Add onions and brown them slightly. Add peas and the head of lettuce cut into eighths. Season with salt and sugar. Sprinkle with the water or broth and cover tightly. Cook gently until peas are tender. Some chefs also recommend the addition of a little parsley and chervil during the cooking.

STRAWBERRY CHIFFON PIE

1 pint of strawberries
3 egg yolks, slightly beaten
½ cup sugar
1 tablespoon lemon juice
1 package strawberry flavored gelatin
½ cup hot water
¼ teaspoon salt
3 egg whites, stiffly beaten

Wash and hull berries. Crush enough berries to make ¾ cup pulp and juice, reserving remaining berries to use as a garnish. To beaten egg yolks add one half of the sugar and the lemon juice. Cook in double boiler until it will coat spoon, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Stir in the strawberry gelatin which has been dissolved in the hot water. Add the ¾ cup of fresh strawberry pulp. Chill in bowl in refrigerator until slightly thickened. Beat salt and remaining sugar into the stiffly beaten whites. Fold lightly into gelatin mixture. Pour into cold baked pie shell or one of the popular graham cracker or cornflakes shells. Chill until firm. Before serving, garnish with whole berries.

STRAWBERRY OMELET

1 pint strawberries
½ cup granulated sugar
1 tablespoon orange juice
1 teaspoon grated orange rind
4 eggs, slightly beaten
3 tablespoons cream
1 tablespoon powdered sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
3 tablespoons butter (preferably sweet)

Select 1 dozen of the firmest berries in the box. Sprinkle these with ¼ cup of the granulated sugar. Add orange juice and rind and allow to stand for ½ hour before starting omelet. Mash remaining berries, add remaining ¼ cup sugar. Stew gently for 5 minutes. Beat eggs only until mixed, add cream, powdered sugar and salt. Melt butter in omelet pan, pour in the egg mixture. Cook omelet gently, lifting edges with a fork as the omelet becomes firm on the bottom so that the uncooked portion can run underneath and cook. When omelet is fairly firm, but not quite done, spread the uncooked berry mixture over the top of it. Cook a minute or two longer. Shake pan gently to loosen omelet, cut two slits in the omelet at right angles to the handle and fold over carefully with a spatula. Transfer to a heated platter and pour over it the hot cooked syrup and serve.

CHICKEN FAVORITE

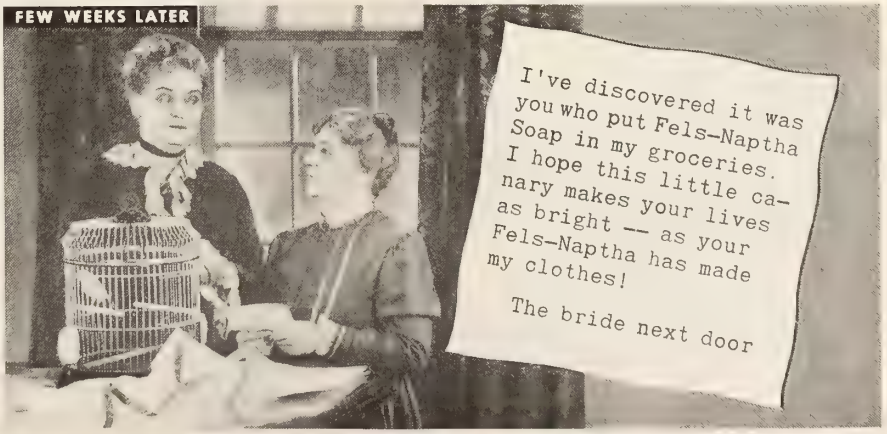
1 broiler (2½-3 pounds)
¼ cup butter
1 small bud of garlic
½ teaspoon salt
a few grains pepper
1 tablespoon flour
1 cup water (or stock made by boiling neck, wing tips and giblets)
½ cup red wine (Bordeaux)
a tiny pinch of thyme
½ bay leaf
1 teaspoon minced parsley
¼ pound fresh mushrooms, cooked

Have broiler cut into small pieces as for fricassee. Dust lightly with salt and pepper. Melt butter in a skillet. Cook garlic bud in the butter for 5 minutes. Remove garlic, add chicken and fry to a golden brown. Remove browned chicken to a baking dish or earthenware casserole. To the fat remaining in the pan, add salt and flour. Stir until blended. Add water or stock, cook until smooth and thickened. Add red wine, thyme, bay leaf, parsley and mushrooms. Stir until thoroughly blended, then pour over chicken. Cover tightly. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) until chicken is tender (about 1 hour). Add cooked mushrooms last 10 minutes of cooking. Serve in casserole surrounded by cooked vegetables.

MATILDA: There! That's why the bride's having plenty of grief, Susan—look what's in her box of groceries!

SUSAN: Never mind, Matilda, pick up your skirts and run! I don't think that dog likes old ladies.

MATILDA: But, Susan, you know it's that weak-kneed soap the bride buys that leaves dirt sticking in her clothes. She'll never get rid of tattle-tale gray—if we don't show her the right kind of soap to use.



SUSAN: But the dog! . . .

MATILDA: Don't be a 'fraidy-cat—I'll take care of the dog. You take that lazy soap out of the bride's groceries and put in our bar of Fels-Naptha Soap.

SUSAN: Nice doggie! We're only trying to be helpful. We're only trying to show the bride how to get whiter washes.

MATILDA: Yes, doggie. Fels-Naptha's richer golden soap and lots of naptha get clothes so clean, tattle-tale gray simply has to scamper.

THE PUNCH THAT'S JUDY

"Mr. Mayer wanted me to have cold shots so I wouldn't be sick," Judy explained. "They aren't so bad, but they do hurt my arm. Each time the nurse says, 'Turn your back and this won't hurt one bit.' When it's all over she says, 'Now, didn't I tell you it wouldn't hurt?' I feel like saying, 'Oh, no! Only when you stick it in my arm and pull it out. The rest I don't even feel!'"

When Judy was on the stage you could hear a pin drop. Dressed simply in a white dress, which might have been for the graduation of any fourteen-year-old, she held her audience spellbound. Each number she sang brought deafening response.

Complimenting Judy on her good taste, she quickly gave the credit where it was due.

"Thank you, but my accompanist should get the credit because he picks out all my clothes and the flowers I wear, too."

Then came the surprise for the day. Judy's mother brings her a present each day and this time it was a stuffed dog that delighted its new owner no end.

"Oh, Mummy, he's adorable and looks almost real," Judy exclaimed with glee. "You know, I have two real live ones at home. One is a German Shepherd and the other's just dog—y'know, the fifty-seven variety kind!

"Honestly, everyone is so wonderful to me I 'most feel like crying sometimes. I don't even get tired doing the shows because when I come out there are lots of people waiting for me. I think it's so nice of them to want me to sign their books, don't you? But, there is a cop downstairs who thinks I'm pretty bad," Judy confided. "Yesterday I walked to the window to look out and everyone began to throw up their books for me to autograph. Everything was fine till one hit me on the nose when suddenly I heard an awful commotion. I looked out and the traffic was blocked by people just standing around looking up. The cop was awful mad.

WE were coming down to the theatre in a taxi today and the driver said, 'You folks are actors, ain't you?' I told him we were acrobats! Then he said, 'I thought so. Who is this Judy Garland kid?' I almost said, I know her and she's an awful brat! But, then I remembered that you have to be careful because he might have relatives on the newspaper."

Of all the shows in New York, Judy picked George M. Cohan in "I'd Rather be Right" and Ed Wynn in "Hooray for What" to see. She was quite frank as to her reasons, saying that she could learn so much in the acting line from them. After the final curtain it was Miss Garland's idea to go backstage and have a talk with Mr. Cohan and receive a few pointers, which she explained helped her immensely in her very first appearance at the State. Proving that this sagacious Miss, chock full of punch, has plenty on the ball. Mention of her pictures and those lovely brown eyes fairly danced.

"I liked the latest best of all," Judy began. "Maybe because it's my first real honest-to-goodness part.

"In 'Everybody Sing', I worked with Miss Fanny Brice and we had some grand numbers, especially one I do in black face with a real southern drawl! Gosh, I guess I'll be pretty glad to get back home."

"Judy, how about Mickey Rooney? You did a marvelous job with him in 'Thoroughbreds Don't Cry.'"

"Oh, Mickey is my best friend and my favorite actor. You know, I think he'll be another Spencer Tracy some day. He's awfully funny though about trying to be grown up. You know, we go to the same school and the other day we were supposed to play some games, but Mickey flatly refused. He said they were too silly and it wasn't playing with us that he objected to, but to the childish games. He smokes a pipe and the minute class is out he runs around the corner, lights it up then comes back puffing and smoking like a steam engine. And the pipe is almost as big as he is, so it makes him look very young.

"Mickey's awfully generous with his praise and likes to tell people when they are good because he thinks it encourages them. He congratulated Spencer Tracy on his performance in 'Captains Coura-

Katharine Hepburn and Cary Grant "Bringing Up Baby"—and not much more baffled than most parents.

Judy Garland, with admirer, looks happy because she is to play "Dorothy" in "The Wizard of Oz."

geous'. Mr. Tracy must have been very appreciative for he said, 'Thanks, Mickey. Coming from you, it's a real compliment.'

"Once someone wrote that I said Freddie Bartholomew would be another Ronnie Sinclair. Why I wasn't even interviewed! Can you imagine that!"

THOUGH her experiences have been extremely interesting, each shows that it's the punch in Judy that puts her across. In fact, her entrance to movieland proves an excellent illustration.

"All this isn't very new to me because I've been on the stage for ten years. Never headlining before, but we always worked steadily.

"My two sisters and I formed a singing trio. Once we almost played New York, but I got homesick so we turned around and went home. I guess we'd still be singing if Suzanne hadn't gotten married.

"Since we lived in Los Angeles, I decided that I should work in the movies. I thought Mr. Mayer's company was the best so I told them I had come to work. They laughed and wanted to know if I'd had experience. When I said eight years on the stage they said, 'All right, let's see what you can do.' I auditioned and they gave me a job in 'Every Sunday.' After that, it was easy.

"The only hard thing at first was to get on to the way you have to act for the camera. On the stage everything is timed fast, but if you do that in a picture you'll overact something awful."

Judy Garland's punch is probably responsible for her aptitude in learning quickly, for not long ago Beulah Bondi, one of the finest actresses, said it took her three years to acclimate herself to movie technique. But not Judy Garland!

THE BAROMETER TELLS A SIX MONTHS' POPULARITY STORY. ARE YOU BOOSTING YOUR FAVORITES?

JOEL McCREA (Second printing) Joel McCrea is one of the few dyed-in-the-wool Californians to be found in Hollywood. Not only is he a native son, but his two grandfathers were bound up in the early history of the state. One arrived via covered wagon with the '49-ers and established the first hotel in San Francisco. The other came West with the Army to fight Indians in the '70's. By the time Joel arrived on the scene in South Pasadena on a certain November 5th, the pioneering was over and the McCreas were socially established and well-to-do. When Joel was a young child they moved to Hollywood, where he attended the Hollywood School For Girls—a shame he shares with Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. There was no other private kindergarten in the town, so especially nice little boys were sent there in spite of their protests. Hollywood High School was the next step, and then Pomona College—that cradle of movie heroes—where he distinguished himself as an athlete. Dramatics were also his specialty, and his movie ambitions were born when Director Sam Wood came to see a college play in which his daughter Jean and Joel played the leads. Encouraged by Wood, he decided on a picture career as soon as he finished college, but progress was slow for a year or two. His fame was confined to the beach, where at a Santa Monica swimming club he played volley ball every Sunday to a gallery of sighing ladies who felt instinctively that that lean brown physique and those forthright blue eyes should have a larger audience. Even after important roles in "The Jazz Age" and "The Poor Little Rich Girl" gave him a firm foothold on the screen, he went through a long, hard apprenticeship playing stiff and dull leading men—partly because the scripts called for dullness, and partly because Joel's talents had not expanded to the point of being able to furnish anything else, except his beautiful torso. When the breaks finally came, he had the experience and maturity to handle them capably, and the rest was easy. Samuel Goldwyn signed him to a contract and his future is assured. "Come and Get It," "Banjo On My Knee," "Woman Chases Man" and "Dead End" are some of the pictures which attest to Joel's coming of age. In "Wells Fargo" he played for the first time with his lovely wife, Frances Dee. Very happily married, they have two sons and a large ranch in the hills back of the Pacific, where on his vacations Joel rides the range with the other cowboys, master of all he surveys.

His address is: in care of United Artists Studio, 1041 N Formosa Ave., Hollywood, Cal.

ANDREA LEEDS (First printing) Long before she had ever seen or heard of a motion picture camera, Andrea Leeds, had lived through grim drama. Though born in Butte, Montana, she was taken at a very early age to the Mexican state of Durango, where her father was a mining engineer. Here the Yaqui Indians were warring against the rebel soldiers who ravaged the countryside in periodic raids. Once on returning to Mexico for a vacation from her high school education in Long Beach, California, she stepped from her railroad coach into a chaos of smouldering ruins, wounded soldiers, and fear and hunger-crazed civilians. Rebels had raided Jiminez! That same summer, when trouble developed in the mine of which her father was superintendent, there was an enforced shutdown. More than one hundred drink-crazed laborers surrounded the house where the Leeds family was dining. After they had broken all the windows with rocks, Mr. Leeds reasoned with them and got them to agree to a conference. When her father was borne away by the motley crew, Andrea never expected to see him again. Her fear was proved unnecessary, but she will never forget this greatest scare of her life. After she had received her Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of California at Los Angeles, she returned to Mexico where she intended to pursue her chosen work, writing. She had been there seven months when unrest again prevailed and her father received several threats that she was to be kidnapped. She was hustled aboard an airplane and flown to Los Angeles. At the University she had appeared in several college productions including a motion picture photographed with a sixteen-millimeter camera. It was now that this film changed her life. For some weeks she had made the rounds of newspaper offices and motion picture studios trying, without success, to get some sort of writing work. Just then the college film bobbed up and Howard Hawks, the director, saw it and believed that Andrea had possibilities. He showed it to Samuel Goldwyn who put her under a long-term contract. Her first role was that of Edward Arnold's daughter in "Come and Get It," but it was from "Stage Door" that she emerged with laurels equal to those bestowed upon the stars. Now she is the outstanding personality in the new technicolor musical, "The Goldwyn Follies." Andrea is five feet, four inches tall, weighs one hundred and twelve pounds, and has brown eyes and brown hair which has been given a golden blonde tint for her present role. She lives with her parents, who left Mexico a year ago to be with her in the film capital.

JOHN HOWARD (Third printing) A young man who might have been an English professor, a pianist, or a painter, is already in his fourth year as a movie actor, at the age of 25. John Howard was born in Cleveland, Ohio, on April 14, 1913. His father, a graduate of the dramatic school of Carnegie Institute of Technology, had been thwarted in his ambition to become an actor. But this is not a case of the parent's disappointed ambitions being thrust upon the child. John's father consoled himself by selling theatrical equipment, and let his son choose for himself. John chose the academic life. Always a good student, in high school he won a scholarship to Western Reserve University in Cleveland, where he became the ideal college man, and distinguished himself in more ways than we can chronicle here. Member of Phi Beta Kappa, president of the Student Council, president of the University Players, senior manager of the basketball team, member of the National Collegiate Players, the University Choir, the Y.M.C.A. Cabinet and the Thalian Club, are a few of the honors he won, in addition to being chosen most outstanding man in the Senior Class. That's not all, but enough to show the direction in which John was headed. He aspired to be a professor of English, and to that end won a scholarship to the graduate school, where he would get his M.A. degree. At that point the moving picture industry entered his life. In the spring of his senior year a Paramount talent scout saw him in a campus show, learned that he was also broadcasting, singing and playing over a local radio station, and sized him up as good picture material.

FRESHNESS!

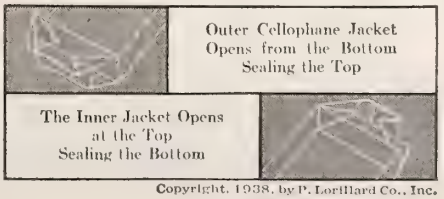
..that's what the world wants in Movie Stars..and Cigarettes

Her Freshness Wins

A favorite of the London stage, Ida Lupino's freshness caught the eye of a Paramount talent scout. She was whisked to Hollywood and stardom in "The Gay Desperado," "Anything Goes," "Artists and Models," "One Rainy Afternoon," "Fight for Your Lady." And the freshness of this young star wins fresh applause!

THE fear of going stale keeps half of Hollywood awake nights. For the brightest star becomes a falling star... once freshness fades.

That's equally true of cigarettes. Staleness often makes a "has been" of a cigarette that ought to be in the prime of stardom. Staleness can transform the mildest cigarette into a harsh irritant and rob it of all flavor.



That's why we run no risks with our delightful young star . . . Old Gold. Every pack of Old Golds carries its own freshness right with it . . . doubly sealed-in by 2 jackets of stale-proof Cellophane.

At the peak of freshness, wherever and whenever you smoke it, every Old Gold gives a perfect performance in the role of America's most appealing cigarette. The price of one pack admits you to this year's biggest smoking hit . . . "Old Gold Freshies of '38".

"DANDRUFF ITCH?"

Use This Antiseptic Scalp Treatment

Skin specialists generally agree that effective treatment must include (1) regular cleansing of scalp; (2) killing germs that spread infection; (3) stimulating circulation of the scalp; (4) lubrication of the scalp to prevent dryness.

To Accomplish This Is Easy With The Zonite Antiseptic Treatment

Just add 2 tablespoons of Zonite to each quart of water in basin . . . Then do this:—

1. Massage head for 3 minutes with this Zonite solution. (This gives hair and scalp an antiseptic cleansing—stimulates scalp—kills all germs at contact.)
2. Lather head with any good soap shampoo, using same Zonite solution. (This cuts oil and grease in hair and scalp—loosens dirt and dandruff scales.)
3. Rinse very thoroughly. (Your head is now clean—your scalp free from scales.)
4. If scalp is dry, massage in any preferred scalp oil. (This relieves dryness.)

RESULTS: By using this simple antiseptic shampoo treatment regularly (twice every week at first) you do what skin specialists say is necessary, if you want to rid yourself of dandruff itch and nasty scalp odors. We believe that if you are faithful, you will be delighted with results.

TRIAL OFFER—For a real trial bottle of Zonite, mailed to you postpaid, send 10¢ to Zonite 510 New Brunswick, New Jersey U. S. A.

INFORMATION DESK

John, with dignity, declined his offer of a trip to Hollywood, his eyes firmly set on the professor's chair. But that night he learned that the family finances would make it necessary for him to go to work the next year, instead of taking his degree at the graduate school, without which there could be no professorship. So he gave in, and arranged to go to New York for a screen test. In September, 1934, he arrived at the Paramount Studio in Hollywood, but it was not until three months later that he made his screen debut in "Car 99." The interim was spent in studying moving picture technique with Phyllis Laughton, Paramount dramatic coach. John was christened John Howard, but he took the screen name of John Cox until, after his first picture, it was decided his own name was better. So he changed back, and now there is a mistaken idea in the mind of the public that John Cox is his real name and John Howard the assumed one. He is 5 feet 10, weighs 150 pounds, and has brown hair and blue eyes. His first real hit was made in "Annapolis Farewell." You also saw him in "Lost Horizon," "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie," and the "Bulldog Drummond" series. He is unmarried, and his hobbies are painting and piano. For a time he considered going back to take his M.A. degree, but this idea seems to have been abandoned.

Carrol Hood, Darlington, S. C. Yes, Robert Young is married. His latest picture is "Paradise for Three," and his address is Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Calif.

Kathryn Gezar, Ambridge, Pa. The birthplaces you asked for are: Gary Cooper and Myrna Loy, Helena, Montana; George Raft and Sylvia Sidney, New York City; Spencer Tracy, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Paul Muni, Lemberg, Austria; and Greta Garbo, Stockholm, Sweden.

Edward Borowy, Newark, N. J. I am sorry, but we do not give out the home addresses of the stars. You can reach Joan Bennett by writing to United Artists Studios, Hollywood, Calif.

Mario Marzitelli, New York City. Write Jane Bryan in care of Warner Bros. Studios, Burbank, Calif.

Marian Morris, Connellsville, Pa. To obtain a picture of Lee Dixon, write to Warner Bros. Studios, Burbank, Calif., and enclose twenty-five cents.

Mrs. Anna Bumstead, Staten Island, N. Y. Fredric March's real name is Frederic Ernest McIntyre Bickel. In January, 1938, he and his wife, Florence Eldridge, appeared on the New York stage in "Yr. Obedient Husband," but the play failed after one week. He is not going to leave the screen.

Mary Kathryn Dunlap, Austin, Minnesota. Edna Mae Durbin, now known as Deanna, was comfortably well off before her screen career began. Her father is a broker. Deanna is fifteen, and doesn't favor any particular sport.

Virginia Atemis, Brea, Calif. There are no movie stars who send their photographs free of charge. You should send a quarter with each request.

William De Lemmo, Harrisburg, Pa. Lois Lindsay is one of the show girls in "Golddiggers In Paris," now being made at the Warner Bros. Studio, Burbank, Calif.

Iris Hemphill, Blythe, Calif. Errol Flynn was born June 20, 1908. He lives in Beverly Hills.

J. Schwartz, New York City. Joy Hodges played in Universal's "Merry-Go-Round of 1938." She is not under contract to them, but you can probably get her picture by writing to Universal Studio.

Ben Halprin, Bronx, New York. Joan Crawford and Charles Boyer have never played together.

L. Kamajian, Philadelphia, Pa. Joan Blondell is an American. She was born in New York City, and has been in every state in the union on vaudeville tours.

REVIEWS • A TOUR

★★★★ The Adventures of Marco Polo

Mr. Goldwyn comes through with a solid hit, an exciting melodrama made more delightful because it is saturated with sparkling comedy.

Marco Polo (Gary Cooper), son of a Venice merchant, and history's first traveling salesman, makes the tedious journey to China to negotiate trade agreements. He discovers, in the order named, the wonders of a stringy substance called "spaghett", a mysterious exploding powder, and the beautiful daughter of the mighty Kublai Khan. The princess is betrothed to the King of Persia, but she is also looked upon by the wicked Amed, villainous counsellor to the Khan.

There is intrigue and bloodshed galore. The hero is noble, the heroine is lovely and the villain unspeakable, but the comedy overtones make the whole thing a gorgeous spectacle and certainly one of the best pictures of the season.

Gary Cooper plays Marco Polo with charm and sophistication, and the newcomer, Sigrid Gurie, lends distinction to the role of the princess. George Barbier is a highly comic Kublai Khan and Basil Rathbone plays Amed with all his subtle arrogance. Others who contribute are Alan Hale, Ernest Truex, Binnie Barnes, H. B. Warner and Lana Turner. Directed by Archie Mayo.—Samuel Goldwyn.

★★ The Baroness and the Butler

When a picture is listed as a continental comedy, you know it will have more than its share of talk, much bowing from the waist, and a generous quota of eye-brow-raising in period drawing rooms.

This is not meant as a condemnation of "The Baroness and the Butler," for, while it has all the standard ingredients, it also has the suave mannerisms of William Powell and the sparkle of Annabella, France's latest substitute for the War Debt. Powell, of course, is the perfect butler, just as Annabella is the perfect baroness, but one wonders just how and when they are going to strike the Boy-Meets-Girl level. Well, Powell goes to parliament as a representative of the labor party, and spends his days bitterly denouncing the aristocratic Prime Minister, who is the baroness' father. After a hard day of haranguing, he returns to his post as the Prime Minister's efficient and loyal butler.

On this slim foundation, Mr. Powell and the lady who refuses to call herself Annabella Annabella, assisted by such old reliables as Henry Stephenson, Helen Westley, Joseph Schildkraut and Nigel Bruce, present first-rate drawing room comedy. Directed by Walter Lang.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ The Big Broadcast of 1938

The big news about the latest Big Broadcast is that it returns W. C. Fields to the screen. Paramount has given the bugle-beaked comic the fattest role of his screen career, and he expresses his gratitude by brightening the proceedings with several hilarious scenes, notably a mad sequence on a golf course.

"The Big Broadcast" is really a vaudeville show. All its entertainment is crowded into the specialty acts. The story adds up to nothing but stage waits between the acts. It has something to do with a transatlantic race between two ocean liners.

Bob Hope, making his screen debut, has an ingratiating personality and helps furnish the picture's high point, when he and Shirley Ross sing the haunting lyric of "Thanks For the Memory." Martha Raye exhibits a pair of limbs which should send Dietrich into hiding, shouts "That Moon is Here Again" and performs a slam-bang adagio routine. Leif Erikson and Dorothy Lamour have little to do in the romance department. Tito Guizar adds to the entertainment with two pleasant Mexican songs, but Kirsten Flagstad is badly handled in a rendition of Brunhilde's Battle Cry. Directed by Mitchell Leisen.—Paramount.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★ Bringing Up Baby

Since "Baby" is a leopard of considerable size and since bringing up this baby is the responsibility of Katharine Hepburn, a scatter-brained heiress, and Cary Grant, an absent-minded professor, you can get an idea what a mad comedy this turns out to be. Though Cary comes out of it all and finds he's won the Hepburn number and a cool million dollars, he takes a terrific beating throughout. For there's nothing too strenuous or too silly for Katie to concoct once she's decided to have Cary for her very own. Their escapades are guaranteed to wear any audience to a frazzle. You'll give up, unlike the hero, trying to make any sense out of the proceedings. But the courtship of poor Cary is probably the most delirious ever filmed.

Involved also is May Robson, the millionaire aunt, who's convinced her niece is stark, staring mad. Then there's Charlie Ruggles, Miss Robson's own B.F. Walter Catlett, Barry Fitzgerald, Fritz Feld and Leona Roberts are others who help to complicate matters. All performances are commendable. You know what Cary can do with comedy, but Katharine will no doubt surprise you. Directed by Howard Hawks.—RKO.

★★★★ The Adventures of Tom Sawyer

"Tom Sawyer" is a swell picture, and if you miss it you're missing one of the most heart-warming and enjoyable films in years.

Director Norman Taurog has wisely chosen not to tinker with Mark Twain's book. So there are no modern touches—everything is just as Twain left it. Tom still plays hookey from school to go fishing with Huck Finn, he takes his beatings regularly from Aunt Polly, he falls properly in love with Becky Thatcher, he rescues Becky from the cave after a breath-taking tussle with cold-blooded Injun Joe, and he and Huck realize every boy's dream when they uncover hidden treasure.

Young Tommy Kelly, making his screen debut, is Tom Sawyer come to life. His performance is really phenomenal. Another newcomer, Ann Gillis, is splendid as Becky Thatcher, and Jackie Moran is an ideal Huck Finn. Notable also are May Robson's portrayal of Aunt Polly, David Holt as the detestable Sid, Marcia Mae Jones as Mary Sawyer, Cora Sue Collins as Tom's erstwhile love, Walter Brennan as Muff Potter and Victor Jory as Injun Joe. Philip Hurlic, Donald Meek, Mickey Rentschler and Olin Howard are excellent.—Selznick-International.

★★ A Slight Case of Murder

From a play by Damon Runyon and Howard Lindsay, "A Slight Case of Murder" fails to capture the lingo and the peculiar appeal of the Runyon fiction characters, but it presents them in an amusing comedy gangster story which is a pleasant relief from the run-of-the-mill hard guy stuff.

Story centers around Edward G. Robinson, who, as Remy Marco, a Prohibition beer baron, goes straight with the advent of repeal and opens a legal brewery, with his former lieutenants as salesmen. While Remy is a very honest character personally, he forgets to change his beer formula, and the public, suddenly rebelling against the etherized nectar which had stood by them during prohibition's years, regards Remy's product as nothing more nor less than shellac. At that moment four parties who are not quite alive—in fact they are most definitely dead—assume surprising roles in steering Remy out of all his difficulties.

Edward G. Robinson turns in a swell performance in the lead, and there is first rate assistance from Ruth Donnelly, Jane Bryan, Willard Parker, Allen Jenkins, Harold Huber, Edward Brophy and Bobby ("Dead End") Jordan. Directed by Lloyd Bacon.—Warner Brothers.

Gertrude Niesen, in "Start Cheering," feels sorta romantic—could it be Jimmy Durante?

As "The Beloved Brat," Bonita Granville bestows a mean look on Emmett Vogan.

★ Start Cheering

Starting out as a satirical poke at typical college musicals, "Start Cheering" has all the indications of a swell ribfest in its early reels, only to fall apart in the middle and turn into what it manifestly is kidding—a typical college musical.

Out of the wreckage, however, one bright shining figure emerges. It is Jimmy Durante, who has been away from pictures too long. The Schnoz, as he is affectionately known, is completely ludicrous and very funny. His brand of humor is entirely his own. Give him a battery of phones, as in the picture's funniest scene, and he dials his own number, talks heatedly to himself and gets nowhere in a fine burst of frenzied hilarity.

Story has to do with a movie hero (Charles Starrett) who enrolls at good old Midland University to bolster that institution's waning popularity. He finds love, of course, with the dean's daughter (Joan Perry) after complications with some of the less Hollywood-minded underclassmen. A good supporting cast includes Gertrude Niesen, Walter Connolly, Raymond Walburn, Broderick Crawford, Ernest Truex, Chaz Chase, and the orchestra of Louis Prima and Johnny Green. Directed by Al Rogell.—Columbia.

★★ Radio City Revels

Stretching a good idea into a full-length picture is a tricky task and has its pitfalls. It can be said for "Radio City Revels" that the dull spots aren't too frequent, and that the original idea, plus a brace of good songs, is good enough to provide fairly diverting entertainment.

Jack Oakie and Milton Berle are a pair of Broadway song writers whose well of inspiration has gone dry. Good luck comes to them in the person of an Arkansas hill billy (Bob Burns) who writes songs in his sleep, but can never remember the tunes when he awakens. Oakie and Berle copy down his stuff and return to fame and fortune.

Biggest asset in the picture is the performance of young Ann Miller. Attractive and charming, she is an admirable dancer and a capable actress with a bright future. Kenny Baker's tenor voice is a distinct asset in his songs. Milton Berle shows great improvement, and Jack Oakie and Bob Burns perform with their customary gusto. Helen Broderick helps, and Jane Froman, singing one song, adds to the pictorial effect. Directed by Ben Stoloff.—RKO-Radio.

★ The Beloved Brat

Spirited treatment of a poor-little-rich-girl theme and consistent characterizations of a well-chosen cast make "The Beloved Brat" good entertainment for most audiences. However, clumsy handling of the dialogue, which inclines toward preachiness, slows up an otherwise worthy film.

Bonita Granville is the unbeloved brat who craves tenderness and affection rather than wealth and comfort. Her parents are much too busy to realize that they have a problem in their young daughter. Miss Granville whips herself up into a series of fine frenzies—rebelling against her sheltered life and all the unfeeling people in it so violently that she is sent to a corrective school for girls. Here she is heartily disliked by all her fellow pupils, until the gentle persuasiveness of the superintendent (Dolores Costello) begins to take effect.

Bonita is at her best in a performance very like her role in "These Three." Donald Crisp, as the remorseful father, does a memorable piece of acting in a father-to-daughter talk, and Dolores Costello is earnest and beautiful. Others who turn in good performances are Lucille Gleason, Stymie Beard, Donald Briggs and Natalie Moorhead. Directed by Arthur Lubin.—Warner Brothers.

★★ Penitentiary

Evidently director John Brahm took the words "moving picture" literally, for he has made a film that is just that—no time wasted on long speeches or unnecessary scene chewing, but a picture that moves rapidly and dramatically, and one which might be seen with profit by a number of Hollywood directors.

Most of the action takes place within prison walls, and although the theme is drab and there is no comedy relief, director Brahm has pointed the drama and paced his scenes so effectively that one's interest never lags. Basically, the story concerns the love of one of the young prison trusties for the warden's daughter. Around this theme there is the usual prison intrigue, made interesting by unusual handling.

Walter Connolly delivers an effective portrayal of the troubled warden, and John Howard has one of his best roles as the young prisoner. Jean Parker plays the girl without too much cloying sweetness, and there are excellent performances by Robert Barrat, Marc Lawrence, Arthur Hohl, and others. It's a well-made picture with no frills, and one which won't disappoint any audience.—Columbia.

Jack Oakie smiles upon the lovely newcomer, Ann Miller, in "Radio City Revels."

In "Penitentiary," nothing comes between Jean Parker and John Howard but the groceries.

Jimmy Stewart and Ann Rutherford are a new team in "Of Human Hearts."

★★ Of Human Hearts

This is a very quiet period picture. Walter Huston is Parson Wilkins, a circuit-riding preacher of the 1850's, and Jimmy Stewart is his son, Jason. Jason wants to be a doctor, and regards his soul-saving father as a failure—chiefly because his Dad's salary is paid in new potatoes and second hand clothes. The story covers a lot of time, carrying Jason from boyhood through college and on to a medical commission in the Union Army. His parents have sacrificed themselves generously to see him through, but Jason, a self-centered young fellow, doesn't realize it until he is brought up short in a very dramatic scene with President Lincoln.

The picture's best performances are turned in by the two actors who impersonate Jason Wilkins—Jimmy Stewart as the adult Jason, and Gene Reynolds as Jason aged twelve. This lad will really bear watching. Walter Huston is satisfactorily hard and earnest as the preacher, and Beulah Bondi charming as his wife. Charles Coburn is good as the small town doctor, John Carradine superb as Lincoln. Directed by Clarence Brown.—M.G.M.

★★ Love, Honor and Behave

A somewhat confused drama of parental influence, "Love, Honor and Behave" will depend largely on the popularity of Wayne Morris and the performance of Priscilla Lane for its success. And the much-publicized "real life romance" of these two players will undoubtedly bring many cash customers to witness their salaried necking on the screen.

Morris' father (Tom Mitchell) believes that everything in the world must be fought for, while his mother (Barbara O'Neill) holds that success and happiness are achieved by being a good loser. In the general confusion, at any rate you'll be happy to learn that the way to hold a wife is to sock her in the jaw, black her eye and administer a stern hand to her bottom.

Wayne Morris goes through the transformation from lamb to fanny spanker with becoming sincerity. Priscilla Lane turns in the best performance of the picture with a spirited portrayal of a forthright young lady who knows what she wants. Directed by Stanley Logan—Warner Bros.

Barbara's career has taken a new lease on life since she began going with Bob. But it's only because she's a new person today.

Bob tells the world Barbara's the girl he loves and it's a new security for her.

MUTUAL BENEFIT

WE DON'T need that old adage about a person being known by the company he keeps to see that Bob Taylor's selection of Barbara Stanwyck for his off-screen, and occasionally on-the-screen-too, sweetheart did a lot for the career of that same Barbara Stanwyck. It didn't make her a better actress—Barbara has always been that—but it did bring her to the fore and onto the front pages and into the minds of millions of movie-goers as she had never been brought before.

But this story isn't about that—that is the obvious thing—and there is a Bob-benefit in Barbara's life which goes much deeper, a much more dramatic and heart-warming story. Countless stories have been written about what Barbara has done for Bob: how her advice guided him, how her confidence sustained him, how the constant companionship of this sturdy-fibered, common-sense girl was a safe tether in this giddy-gaddy town.

It's time now at last, that the other part of the story be told. It has somewhere been written that a love only lasts when each of the two who share that love gives something good and great to the other. In this story, then, you will also find the reason why Bob and Barbara are, just about now, celebrating their second friendship anniversary.

It was six months after Barbara had come to the end of her marriage with Frank Fay that she met Bob. To describe the girl she was at that time is to describe a drab-hearted young woman who already felt that her span of happiness and activity, and that her place in the world, no longer existed.

In drawing her portrait at this period it is impossible to do so accurately without bringing in the dire effect that her past life with her husband, a long period of seven years, had etched on her. But since Barbara has only recently gone to court to say that her ex-husband is not a desirable companion for their young adopted son, and since she offered numerous signed affidavits to prove her contention, we are not overstepping the bounds of kindness and decency in touching on that subject. What goes into the courts and into the newspapers is public domain of a sort. Whatever Frank Fay's importance and worth as an entertainer and a man is, it is a fact that as Barbara Stanwyck's husband he wreaked a very great harm on her. Barbara lost the first round of her recent suit; the judge ruled that Fay should be allowed to see the six-year-old Dion at appointed times, but there are still those affidavits to be reckoned with and the case is being appealed. More than that, to go back to our point, there was Barbara Stanwyck, at the time the divorce was granted.

We say she was drab-hearted. A lot of things had contributed to it. For seven years Barbara had not known what it was to be a personality, a personality with ideas of her own, work of her own, friends of her own. Under the constant pressure of the egotism of a man who referred to himself as "The Fay" (Continued on page 110)

Hurrying to keep that date with Babs! And she isn't the only one to benefit from their romance, either. It's had a far-reaching effect on Bob, too!

HIS LIFE'S EXCITING

DOUG, JR. HAS HAD MORE ROMANCE, TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE AT TWENTY-EIGHT THAN MOST OF US EVER RATE

A TALL young man was on the Blue Train Express, going from Paris to Monte Carlo. He lounged along the corridor of the car, smoking, contemplating the familiar contours of the Maritime Alps. A compartment door was open and through it wafted an intriguing scent, faint but nostalgic; mysterious, even mesmeric. The young man glanced discreetly into the compartment. A lady sat there, lovely. She smiled. Pretty soon they were talking of many things. There was dinner, à deux. The Blue Train Express rolled into Monte Carlo. The tall young man said goodbye to the lady. He didn't know her name. She didn't know his. They didn't meet again. It was adventure, unsought, brief.

The young man was Douglas Fairbanks, Junior. The lady must be to us, what she is to him, nameless.

"My life is exciting," says Douglas. This is why.

Excitement is a glaze laid lightly over matter-of-fact, over habit, over repetition and routine. Douglas takes care not to scratch the glaze. He is restless, nervous. He moves from place to place. He makes movies, writes and tears up what he has written, the fire of creation being sufficient unto itself. He has been in love. He handles life deftly, never asking too much or too little.

In Hollywood now, he will not plan to stay there indefinitely, will not buy a house, strike roots, will not marry soon.

"I never want to stay in any one place long," he told me. "I am restless and, after all, if you want to keep in tune with the rhythm of life you will keep moving.

"Am I bored with life? Never! I do try to avoid repetition of things a second touch would kill. But there are other things. I've crossed the ocean thirty times and I never feel a ship pull out of port that I don't get misty-eyed. I never catch a 'first' glimpse of land that it isn't really the first to me, and I choke up. I've been in the air I don't know how many times and I never see a plane take off that it doesn't grip me by the throat.

"I never start a picture that we don't have to do retakes on the first three days' shooting, because I'm so jittery that I muff things. Invariably I have the feeling that I've never faced a camera before.

I NEVER want to lose this sense of 'first experiences'," said Douglas. "It seems to me that to meet every adventure as though it were for the first time is to keep the savour of life sweet and strong on your lips."

"But is a person just born that way," I said, "or do you have to work for it?"

"I have to work for it, in part," said Douglas, "because you have to prod yourself into awareness of how curious everything is and once you are properly curious, you are alive! There are men, I suppose, born Casanovas, who believe that the only experiences worth having are romantic experiences. They seek for them and, of course, to seek for experience in romance is to lose it, I feel sure. Though there is nothing so presumptuous as to lay down rules and regulations about love. When I read articles in which actors define love, tell others how to 'manage' love, to find it or keep it, I feel nauseated. How the devil do they know how to tell others about love, what they should do about it?"

"You've been in love, haven't you?" I asked.

"How should I know?" countered Douglas. "I've thought so, yes. Infatuations, perhaps. Love, perhaps. But whether there is one love in a man's life, or which love of many is the real love, I wouldn't be so presumptuous as to guess."

Douglas is not bored with life. He sees to that. And thereby I lost my bet, which I had placed on the nose of Boredom. For I had remarked to Douglas that I should suppose he would be satiated, "too, too weary to fight stagnation," as his friend Noel Coward warbles.

I had, I felt, good grounds for my assumption. For Douglas has had, in his twenty-eight vivid years, more large hunks of life, and love and adventure than befall most men when the age numeral is reversed and they are eighty-two.

Long the young Crown Prince of Hollywood, son of his famous father, only son of the House of Pickfair, to the portals of which came princes and poets, explorers and socialites, inventors and eminent authors the boy, while still a boy, could take a Prince without a genuflection, could prattle unselfconsciously to a Lindbergh or an H. G. Wells, could and did parry thrusts of wit with the brite-brains of two continents, or three.

HE KNEW the forcing-house of domestic upheaval, the divorce of his parents, the (Continued on page 78)

Doug used to write for publication, but now it's just for fun.

You'll see Douglas, Jr. with Ginger Rogers in "Having Wonderful Time"—and you will, too!

Jeanette and Hubby Gene Raymond do everything together. They like polo.

HAS SHE

BY GLADYS HALL

HAVE YOU anything left to want?" I asked Jeanette MacDonald.

Jeanette said, immediately, and meaning her answer, "Yes. To keep what I have." She added, after a moment, "to be big enough to take the down-grades if they come; to be able to hold the memory of this happiness when, inevitably, some of it must go."

Jeanette was serving tea in the soft-toned rose and rust living-room of the Bel Air home which Gene Raymond bought for his bride, carrying her across the threshold in keeping with the old tradition. They care about tradition, Gene and Jeanette; they believe in yesterday as well as today; they contemplate tomorrow with questioning eyes, as all intelligent people must. The late gilt sun came through the ceiling-high window at the big room's end, it touched the silver-framed photograph of Gene and Jeanette as bride and groom, on the piano; it fingered the silver bowls of roses Jeanette loves beyond all other flowers; it aureoled the red-gold hair of Jeanette herself, made blue jewels of her eyes as she sat in the high-backed wing chair, wearing a simple brown frock sashed in vivid green, nibbling candies from a blue basket at

They both love horses and can be seen on the bridle path every day.

On their evenings at home, Jeanette and Gene like to read.

All dressed up and set for a bit of stepping. Handsome couple, what?

her side. And she looked so sort of shiningly happy that had the sun ceased to shine the room would still have been illumined.

Jeanette is fiercely superstitious about discussing her happiness, fearing that if she puts it into words the jealous gods, having it called to their attention, may be old Indian-givers and snatch it away from her, just to demonstrate that such earthly Paradise is not for the children of men. Before Jeanette was married, she was afraid to talk about her wedding day; she was sure that if she did something would happen, something would cloud or postpone that sufficiently laggard June night.

It is hard to think of her as wanting anything more than she already has. She is married to the man she loves and the man she loves loves her. There are Penelopes a-plenty who would consider that life had done right smart by them if it gave them their Prince Charming, with all his heart. And, riches piled on riches, she has her beautiful home with all of Gene's thought of her expressed in every exquisite luxury and detail. Just to have such a home would give many a woman cause to feel that she had not lived in vain. And Jeanette is young, and beautiful and in glowing health; she has her mother living close by her, she doesn't have to diet (she dotes on baked beans). She has friends, Ginger Rogers, the Allan Joneses, Jimmy Stewart, among the many others; she has the coöperation and respect of everyone at her studio. She is not only a gifted actress, but she has the voice as well and offers from the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, goal of how many singers, and offers, innumerable, to do concert work. She is well aware of her possessions. But she's humble withal.

I'LL WANT to remember," she said, thoughtfully nibbling a caramel, "that I worked hard to attain success; that it didn't come easily nor in the guise of 'breaks.' I worked very hard during those early days in New York. For months I traveled daily, from manager to manager, from agent to agent, but no one had a part for a too-thin, unknown youngster from Philadelphia. To earn the money needed for my wardrobe, for girls seeking theatre jobs just had to look prosperous, I posed for commercial photographers. I worked one whole hot summer through as a model for a fur-manufacturing company, of all things! No one has ever given me anything I (Continued on page 104)

When Jeanette was asked if she had anything left to want, her answer was a surprising one, but completely sincere.

GLAMOR FOR RENT

Katharine Hepburn is shown here at the wheel of the expensive foreign car she drove when newly arrived in Hollywood. But today? It's a station wagon for her!

Carole Lombard used to be known for her tremendous parties, but not any longer. Now, between pictures, she goes to her ranch and isn't above milking the cow.

BY CAROLINE SOMERS HOYT

SOMEBODY has said that you might as well ask an electrician what electricity is as to try to get someone to define glamor. They both thrill and kill and they both defy analysis. Good enough, that, but the analogy goes even further. Like electricity, you can also buy or rent glamor, if you only plug in on the right connection.

But the trouble is that the glamor company isn't paying quite the same dividends as the public power set-ups and that's something that does deserve analysis. What's happened?

There used to be a day when a young actress bidding for attention could, and would, with only a few dollars in her pocket, burst upon the world in a ten thousand dollar mink coat, wearing a diamond as big as her hope, and lolling magnificently in the squashy back seat of a millionaire's limousine. Today the mink coats are more likely Japanese imitations, the diamonds remain in some jeweler's dark vaults, and the limousines—you can see them displayed in several show rooms out along Sunset Boulevard—have as their only occupants the salesmen who are supposed to be out peddling them, and they are asleep in them.

Dreaming of days gone by, no doubt, the good old days when glamor was glamor and when nobody minded paying a slight sum a week for it. It wasn't the weekly rental that meant so much to the boys in the glamor business, it was the sales which resulted from the "this used to belong to Miss So-and-So" angle that kept them rolling on tires with a tread on them, and that's the loss that's making them so gloomy now.

Here's how it used to work. Memory alights first on that day back in '31 when the glamor business received one of its greatest boosts in all its long history. A young girl, unknown, by the name of Katharine Hepburn, was due to arrive in Hollywood, and an hour before her arrival on The Chief at Pasadena a wire from her agent in New

Jimmy Stewart, along with a lot of other high salaried men stars, takes care of his own moderately-priced car and can be seen often polishing up the buggy.

Remember the days when a million dollars was considered well spent to ballyhoo some new star no one had ever seen? Simone Simon ended that era.

GONE ARE THE PALMY DAYS WHEN SWANK WAS A BIG BUSINESS IN HOLLYWOOD. THE STARS HAVE RIGHT ABOUT FACED AND THERE'S A NEW WAY OF DOING THINGS NOW

York, delivered at the Cinema Motor Company, requested that she be met by something "flashy." This was the one word that described something luxurious in those days.

And thus it was that as this slim suit-clad figure alighted from the train she found, among those who clustered around her, one whose face was quite dark and who looked out at her from under the very latest in chauffeur's caps, and for the benefit of the photographers who were waiting to snap her she said, "I'll be a few minutes, Jones. You can take my bags and wait for me at the car." Then between smiles and handshakes, she watched the direction taken by Jones, or whatever his name was, and a few minutes later, with reporters trailing around her, she made her way after him.

The press gasped when they saw the car. It was an imported model, an Hispana-Suiza, black, but with plenty of shiny aluminum encasing its eel-like body. The trick worked. They took pictures of her getting into it; they took pictures of her beaming out from it; and the word spread through the world that a new glamor girl had arrived. The car, valued at twenty thousand dollars, it might be added, cost Miss Hepburn only $30 a day, but the lineage it received in the papers, if it had been bought and paid for, would have cost her much more.

She didn't keep the car long, and since then of course it has been completely overshadowed by its black sheep descendant, the famous Hepburn station wagon; but at the time it more than served its purpose, and Miss Hepburn also served hers. Not so long after Miss Hepburn's first picture, the limousine found a very delighted owner who could, from that moment on, boast to his friends that they were now riding in the very same car in which, once upon a time, Katie rode.

Today there is one lone star who still drives forth in that early Hepburn tradition, and that is Connie Bennett. And hers, sadly enough, is bought and paid for. As for the others who don't even have limousines, they drive their own small cars and on Sunday morning you can even see some of them out Simonizing them. That homey, personal touch, this back to back-bending trend which has become so popular in the movie colony, it's this that the boys in luxury row are sadly complaining about.

AND THERE is another type of glamor vendor who is also scratching his head these days, and that is the billboard salesman who used to sign 'em up for seven-sheet spreads on every main road, and on every five-point corner from here to New York. He still rents plenty of space to the movie producing companies to advertise their forthcoming productions, and what's playing next at your neighborhood theatre, but where are those old personal campaigns, the kind that (Continued on page 101)

THAT THING

BY FRANC DILLON

KICKING UP A ROW TAKES TOO MUCH ENERGY, AVERS HERBERT MARSHALL, WHO HAS SEEN TROUBLE-MAKERS GO OFF AT THE DEEP END

TEMPERAMENT," remarked Herbert Marshall thoughtfully, "means to be fired by ambition to reach a certain goal, to be so set on accomplishing your aim that you cast everything else aside and are apt sometimes to be irritated out of all proportion by things or people who get in your way.

"Actors haven't got a normal job. It is largely temperament that makes an actor."

It's been hinted, however, that his directors, fellow actors and all who know him declare Marshall to be the calmest, most even tempered person they know.

"Oh, I burst out at times," he insisted. "I fight for my rights. Don't think that I don't."

I remembered hearing of an incident that illustrates very well his ability to look after his own interests. According to the story, a certain producer treated a friend of Marshall's in a way that didn't seem quite cricket to the Englishman. He decided not to work for that producer again, but instead of bluntly refusing future offers from that source, he instructed his manager to set his salary to that producer so high that no more offers would be forthcoming.

Imagine his surprise when the producer said, "All right, if that's your price. When can you come to work?"

Marshall was then able to decline the offer with the plea that he was too busy with other roles. For a principle, he turned down a role and a salary that were very inviting. And did so in such a deft manner that the producer doesn't yet realize what happened. That is one way Marshall has of "bursting out."

"When I have anything to argue about, I say it quietly to the person concerned," he said, which certainly is not Hollywood's usual way of doing things.

There the word "temperament" is used to cover a multitude of sins of omission and commission. If a star demands all the big scenes and close-ups, she is said to be "temperamental," just as the same description applies if she refuses to give autographs or makes unreasonable requests.

When Mr. M. speaks his piece, it's only to the person concerned.

With the "temperamental" Simone in "Girls' Dormitory."

CALLED TEMPERAMENT

SIMONE SIMON, in the short time she has been in Hollywood, has threatened to put all past performances of her predecessors out of the running with her unpredictable performances.

Probably Hollywood anticipated a few unscheduled pyrotechnics when Ruth Chatterton and Simone were cast in Herbert Marshall's picture together. But that he would encourage any such scenes by sympathizing with an offender seemed unexplainable. However, in fairness, Mr. M. spoke up in defense of the little French girl, whose ability he greatly admires. And there was good, sound sense in what he said, too.

"You know how difficult it would be for you to try and make a picture in—say Hungary. You might understand the language, as Simone does English, but you wouldn't be able to understand their slang, their ordinary conversation. A language you learn from books is quite different from that you hear on a set. You would be trying to remember your lines, translating their meaning into your own language in your brain, and simply wouldn't be able to keep your balance. You couldn't take direction if you couldn't understand it. That, I believe, was Simone's trouble at first."

Having whitewashed Simone so beautifully, I baited him with Katharine Hepburn, whom Hollywood calls "temperamental," and with whom he worked in "A Woman Rebels."

"You can't call a girl temperamental who brought a lunch every day in her station wagon for twelve or fourteen people," he replied. "And the most delicious food!" he enthused. "She would invite the director, the people who were working with her—props, cameramen and anyone who happened to be around—to lunch with her. Her servants brought the food out, but she helped them to spread it out, fixed the tablecloth and waited on everyone herself. It is pretty nice for a star to wait on table for the people working in her picture. You can't call that temperament," he said stoutly.

Clearly, Katie could do no wrong.

"As to barring visitors from her sets, I can't say that I blame her. You know, I said a moment ago that actors haven't got a normal job. When there are no outsiders on the set we work along. I can make love to a girl with an electrician two feet away from us holding a spotlight. He doesn't embarrass me because he belongs there. We think nothing of it. It's our work. But just let me catch a glimpse of a strange pair of trousers or a new skirt standing on the sidelines and my mind is bound to wander. I'm immediately embarrassed. No one can be expected to do good work with strangers watching.

BETWEEN SCENES we kid around, act a little crazily and do things that to an outsider would seem a bit odd; things that sometimes mark real genius; things that make an actor different from his audience. We are slightly mad. But what would seem like madness to an outsider is sometimes inspiration. I think most actors would like to be able to exclude visitors from the set. I know perfectly well, I should.

"Outside the studio I know nothing of Miss Hepburn," Marshall continued. "But temperament, getting back to what Hollywood calls by that over-worked term, is silly. It takes too much time and energy and is so foolish. Nobody with brains goes in for it.

"When I came here I was advised what to do to get along. I was told I would receive more consideration if I had none for anyone else. It didn't make sense to me. During my experience I've seen so many temperamental stars go off the deep end, and I've never seen it pay."

One recalls Mr. Marshall's successful career on the stage, both in London and New York. As a boy he didn't particularly want to be an actor. His father, Percy Marshall, was a well-known star and Master Herbert had no illusions about the stage. He chose to be a business man and went about getting himself educated for it. When that was done he became an articled clerk in a public accounting business.

SMALL TOWN GIRL

By KAY PROCTOR

VIRGINIA BRUCE MAY BE A GLAMOR GIRL, BUT DON'T ENVY HER, SHE WARNS, BECAUSE FAME, TOO, HAS ITS PRICE

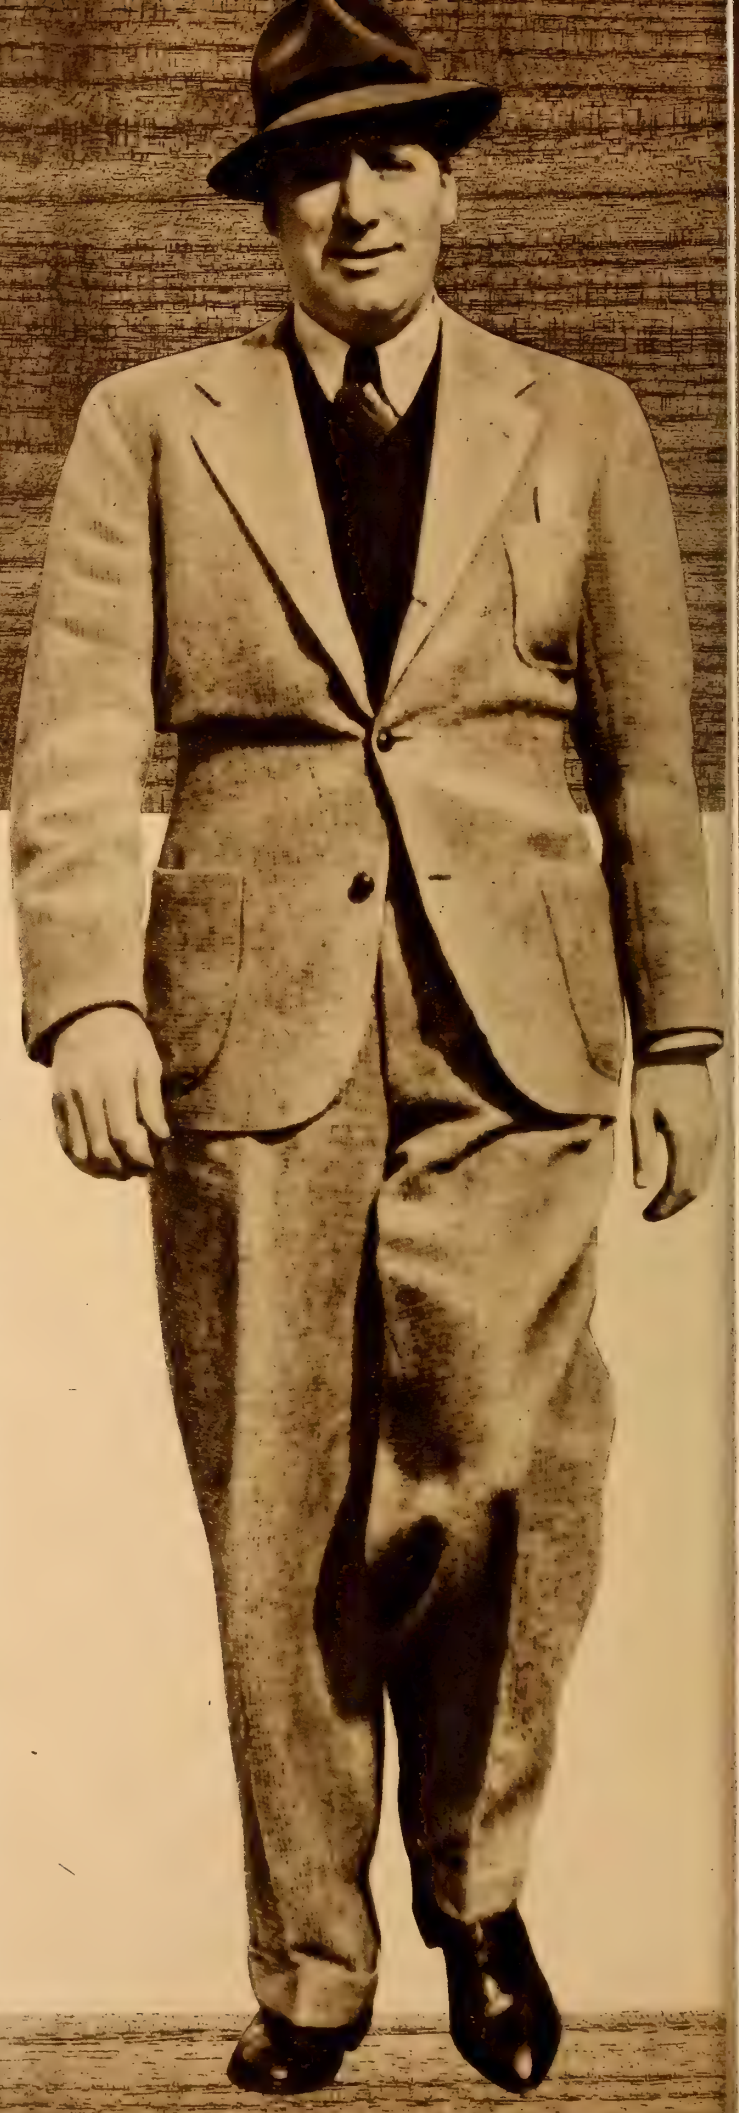
VIRGINIA BRUCE was homesick. But not in the usual sense which that phrase implies. After all, her home is right where she is—a stately mansion in Beverly Hills. And she doesn't long for the Broadway she once knew as a glamorous Ziegfeld show girl.

She was homesick for the small prairie town of Fargo, North Dakota, where she spent her youth. She wanted to know again the fun of life in a square-cut red brick house, of kitchen showers for brides and ice skating on the town rink, a flat field flooded by the local fire department and frozen by bitter winter cold.

You scoff? Sure. So did I when Virginia said as much, over a steaming cup of tea. If ever small town life seemed remote it was on that sunlit California afternoon with the glamorous Bruce, exquisite in every detail from the top of her shining gold head to the tips of her hand-turned slippers.

What started this story, I suppose, was a letter with a Fargo postmark Virginia had been reading. It was from a former high school chum and was full of small gossip about John, who had been one of Ginny's beaux in high school, and his latest raise at the hardware store; about the cute thing Mary Louise's two-year-old Bobby had said when the bridge club met at his mother's house; about the grand time everyone had at the last shindig of the B. and B. In Fargo that's not benedictine and brandy; it's Bachelors and Benedicks, the swank social club of the town.

(There was an intimate P.S. to the letter. We'll get to that presently.)



"I suppose that bucolic picture of contentment seems vastly amusing to you now," I said. It definitely was the wrong remark. She bridled.

"I don't know why it should (Continued on page 88)

STRANGER THAN FICTION

By GLADYS HALL

ALAN MOWBRAY'S TRUE LIFE STORY IS MORE EXCITING THAN ANYTHING YOU'VE EVER READ IN A BOOK

HE BECAME an actor by mistake.

He is one of the painfully few survivors of the Retreat from Mons.

He won four medals in the World War, loaned them to a friend, forgot about them, had them returned to him years later by Mrs. Joe E. Brown, who found them in a pawnshop.

He once spent four months on a park bench, in Central Park.

He was married in Reno as a precaution against divorce. His wife was, before her marriage, Lorayne Carpenter, Chicago Junior Leaguer.

He once seconded his pal, Maxie Rosenbloom, in Maxie's last fight.

He was the first man to broadcast from an airplane. It was during the Canadian National Exposition and he officially opened the first air broadcast.

If he were not an actor he'd like to be a doctor (in a girls' school!) or in the Diplomatic Service if there was something doing.

He detests "Hollywood publicity." And engages no one to "do publicity" for him. Says he used to read how "Alan Mowbray was seen skiing at Arrowhead where he is week-ending at his de luxe lodge" or "Alan Mowbray rusticating over the week-end at his ranch in the valley." He doesn't own a lodge. He doesn't own a ranch. He doesn't week-end. He usually works week-ends. A free lance, he worked forty-two weeks last year.

He recently bought a house in Beverly Hills. It is the first, as it is the only, home he owns.

He has lived too many times on the hard bedrock of life, in the trenches, on Poverty street, to tolerate pose, pretense, pomp or sham. He debunks everything, including himself. When some socialite asked him, airily, how his new house was furnished he said, "Oh, with chairs and tables and things like that, you know." When the socialite persisted and asked "what kind of furniture?" Alan said, "Period. I buy a piece one month, wait a month, then buy another." He said, "Chairs are made to be sat in, sofas to be slept on, books to be read. That's all I know about interior decoration."

Away from the camera, Alan Mowbray's life centers about his lovely wife and their two small children.

Alan accepts any role offered him. Result? Scenes like the above, from "Merrily We Live" with Patsy Kelly.

He takes any part offered him, sight unseen. Sometimes, he says, he may discover that he is the butler falling in with the tea. Other times he gets a big break. He figures that the law of averages will operate in his behalf, so why worry? He is a "quick study" and never looks at his lines until just before he steps onto the set.

He has only seen himself in one picture. And that only because "I was a magician," said Alan, "and I wanted to see how I did the tricks." He never sees rushes nor any of his other pictures. He detests the sight of himself on the screen.

He has two children, Patricia Mowbray, aged six and a half, and Alan Mowbray, aged three. He calls them "P. M." and "A. M."

HIS FRIENDS are varied and various. Among them, Bill Robinson, the president of a huge bonding corporation, Clarence Muse, Joe Lewis, Guy Rennie, Bart Marshall, Captain Erickson, the explorer, Pat O'Brien, the Ritz Brothers, composers, surgeons, crooners, judges, vaudevillians. He says, "I don't care anything about color, creed, social status or race. So long as they are hot heels they are my friends."

Which calls to mind one of the funniest cracks ever made. One night Alan and Bill were together, on some program or something. Alan was going on to the Troc. He asked Bill to join him. Bill refused. "Oh," said Alan, "drawing the color line, are you?" Bill nearly died with laughter.

He has no enemies. All men are his friends. Which is, really, all one need say about a man to describe what manner of man he is.

There is not a picture, not even a snapshot of Alan in all the rooms of his comfortable, homey Beverly Hills home. It is not an actor's home. It is the home of Lorayne Carpenter Mowbray and her husband and their children. While Alan and I were talking the other afternoon, small "P. M." came in and sat with us, Most actors, most fathers, indeed, would have sent the child scuttling. Not Alan. "She has as much right in here as I have," he said.

He authored the play, "Dinner Is Served." It was produced in New York, London, Hollywood, Toronto and Harrisburg, Pa. It took him five nights to write it. It was produced in five cities. There were five members in the cast. He has also written five other plays, movie scenarios and one uncompleted novel. He wrote, directed and acted in a picture called "Motives." He has written three one-act plays called, "A Bang and Two Echoes." And these plays demonstrate that under the springy Mowbray walk, the ready Mowbray laugh, the bright bold glance of his eye, the wise cracking, the ad libbing, there is a spirit as strong and flexible as steel, a heart as tender as a woman's, an imagination touched by the sorrows of all men.

Alan Mowbray was born in London, England, August 18th, 1896. He will tell you that his sole ancestors were Adam and Eve. His earliest ambition was to be a soldier. Came the World War and Alan was a soldier indeed, enlisting with the famous "Old Contemptibles." He was in France, under fire, for four and a half years. He was gassed twice, wounded five times, decorated by King George — the decorations which he subsequently loaned and lost and eventually recovered. He knows all the mud and misery, the gallantry and gravity of the trenches.

When he came out of the war he was at loose ends. Didn't know where to go, what to do. He often says that the turning of street corners has determined his life for him. He had, when he got back to London, a date to meet a pal for luncheon. The pal was an actor and had an appointment at a theatrical agency. He suggested that Alan meet him there. "If it rains," the friend said, "just go inside and wait." It rained. Alan went inside, sat among the applicants on one of the benches, and waited. A producer appeared. He pointed a long forefinger at (Continued on page 84)

THE RED-HEADED girl laughed incredulously.

"You mean," she said, "you expect me to pretend to be an American? Why, who in the world would believe such a story? The map of England is written all over my face, and my accent is as broad as the British Empire."

The tall Texan twisted his hat in his hand.

"I can teach you to talk like a Texan in a few weeks. And if you'll dye your hair black and cut it with bangs, you'll look as American as Colleen Moore."

"All right, Mr. McCloud," said the red-head. "I don't think it'll work, but if you're willing to gamble, I'll try it."

And that's how British Binnie Barnes came to be billed as "Texas Binnie" on a South African tour in which she helped Tex McCloud put over a patter and rope act. She learned to handle a rope like the girls who are reared to that sort of thing, and she studied geography books on Texas till she knew more about the Lone Star State than most of its natives.

She even returned to England, where she was billed in a night club as "Texas Binnie." At that time American performers were very popular abroad, and Charlot, the producer, caught her act one night, sent for her, and asked, "Are you an American?"

"Taixan," she replied.

And she was hired for "Charlot's Revue," where she made such a hit that eventually she landed in Hollywood.

Today she'll frankly admit that her career was founded on a bluff. The astonishing thing is that so many Hollywood careers are.

Perhaps it's because the qualities needed to put over a successful hoax often tend to make people great actors and actresses. They must be reckless and daring, willing to gamble their careers on the success of their hoax. They must not be too sensitive, for if they are, fear will overcome them and they will not be able to see the bluff through, and they must be able to act the rôle they have chosen to play so skillfully that the wisest producers are deceived.

You might imagine that producers would be furious when they find they have been the victims of a bluff, yet in Hollywood the successful perpetrator of a hoax is congratulated rather than disliked.

Rosalind Russell put one over which was the exact opposite of Binnie Barnes'. A number of years ago, when she was bluffing her way along the early bumpy road to fame, she heard that E. E. Clive's All-British Copley Players were about to put on a show. When she went to the producer she spoke to him in a crisp English accent, telling him that she was an experienced actress. Not for a moment did he question her nationality. Rosalind got the job, which started her on the upward climb. And how shocked her fellow actors were when they learned weeks later that she was born just a state away from where they were playing!

IRENE DUNNE put over a successful bluff even before she became an actress. Just after she graduated from school, she got a job teaching in a small town in Indiana. When she heard that a scholarship was being offered for vocal students by a musical school in Chicago, owned by the late Flo Ziegfeld's father, she saw her chance. Although she had never studied voice with a professional teacher, her mother, a pianist, had taught her.

She went to Chicago, announced that she had studied for years, was granted an audition and won one of the scholarships. As a result, the small Indiana town lost a teacher.

When Bill Powell graduated from dramatic school in New York, he went to David Belasco's office to ask for a job. Even in those days Bill was well turned out. He was suave and well-groomed, and he had a pleasant voice, so Belasco's son-in-law agreed to give him a chance as an actor. But when Bill heard what the salary was, he was annoyed rather than grateful. For Belasco's office refused to pay him more than $18.a week.

For several days he haunted producers' offices, until finally he found another who was willing to take a chance on him. But he too, wouldn't pay more.

Startled that two producers should have offered him the same salary, Bill investigated and discovered that that was the standard salary paid all young men who had just graduated from a dramatic school. The only way to persuade a producer to pay him more would be to convince him that he had had a good deal of experience.

To Arch Selwyn's office he went, to ask for a part in "The Ne'er-Do-Well."

"Any experience?" asked Mr. Selwyn.

"I've been with stock companies in the Middle West for years," said William Powell.

Counting on the fact that it would be too much trouble for Selwyn to verify his story, he mentioned the names of several companies.

"All right," said Selwyn, "I'll start you at forty dollars per week."

SONJA HENIE, today, is one of the ten greatest box-office stars in Hollywood, but a little over a year ago when the magnificently determined Sonja decided to become a motion picture star, Hollywood had never heard of her, even though she had won ten ice-skating championships.

How did Sonja succeed in interesting movie magnates? According to Dorothy Kilgallen, the girl reporter who flew around the world, it was all accomplished through a trick.

The fact that Hollywood wasn't interested in her did not deter Sonja. She decided to make Hollywood want her. As she traveled across the continent, she was met at the big cities by reporters. In one city she told them she had signed a contract with (Continued on page 82)

LOLA LANE, the round eyed ingenue, has been replaced by a new sophisticated Lola. The new Lola made her debut as the temperamental movie star in "Hollywood Hotel". There is an interesting story behind this right about face of Lola's—a story unparalleled in the career of any other Hollywood actress.

Lola told it to me while we were having lunch in her dressing-room. She had just finished a morning of strenuous scenes, where, as the fearless reporter in "Torchy Blane in Panama," she had jumped from an ocean liner into the ocean. She was wrapped in a heavy robe to counteract the chill of the ocean (a large tank of water lying below her stateroom door), and her maid was holding a hot drier on her wet hair.

"When I first arrived in Hollywood, I thought that the world was my oyster," Lola began. "The thrill and excitement of all the publicity and glamor that surrounds every young girl making her debut in pictures, swept me into a make believe world. Jumping as I had from a piano playing job in the little movie theatre in my home town, Indianola, Iowa, into a 'Gus Edwards Revue' and them into the 'Greenwich Village Follies' and from there onto Broadway with George Jessel in 'The War Song', success came too fast and too easily. When I was offered a motion picture contract with the Fox Studio, I thought the world was mine to do with as I pleased.

"The idea seems prevalent that I gave up my career when I married Lew Ayres and again when Al Hall and I were wed. That is not the case. I admit that a happy marriage with children might have driven away my desire for a career. As marriage did not turn out happily for me, I continued working whenever the opportunity presented itself. There were long, discouraging waits between work.

"As time went on, the parts which I did and the pictures I played in got less and less to my liking. I became convinced that the ingenue roles I was being cast for were not suited to me. However I was unable to convince directors and producers.

REALIZING that something drastic must be done if I expected to go on with my career, I commenced to study myself—take myself apart to see what was wrong. It commenced to dawn upon me that my style of dress (like most young girls, I liked frills and ruffles), my clowning and laughing (the Irish in me coming out), my gay, carefree attitude towards life had definitely stamped me as an ingenue. I realized that if I expected to do grown-up, sophisticated roles that I must actually grow up. Deliberately I set about to make myself over.

"I leased a modest, white farm house in a remote, quiet spot of the San Fernando Valley. As I always have been acutely sensitive to my surroundings, the first thing I did out there was replace the heavy, dark window drapes throughout the house with bright, gay chintz. I had plain ivory and turquoise slip covers fitted over the somber-hued divans and chairs. The red brick fireplace in my bedroom (it was that fireplace that made me decide to take the house) and the one in the living room were painted white. Bright blue, yellow and green outdoor chairs and couches were set around the lily pond fountain below the long brick terraced porch and under the acacia trees.

"I had never actually lived in the country before," said Lola. "Never before had I spent days on end away from people and excitement. I loved it.

"In the peace and quiet of my new home I had time to read the books that before I had never gotten around to. I read plays and scripts. I studied books on diet and health. I put myself on a rigid schedule of diet and exercise. I took long walks in the hills. I spent hours stretched out in the sun.

"My hair that had been bleached a golden yellow, so that the camera could better pick up the lights, grew back to its natural light brown shade. As the permanent disappeared the natural, soft wave returned. I changed my hair dress from the short bob to shoulder length."

Before long the outdoor life, rest, diet, exercise and study commenced to change Lola's appearance—even her personality. Her full face became thin and interesting. Her round eyes seemed to narrow and grow darker. (Continued on page 115)

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT

BY IDA ZEITLIN

When it comes to tripping the light fantastic, Mr. Murphy is second to just about nobody.

IF GEORGE HADN'T LOST HIS HEART TO THAT PRETTY GIRL HE WOULDN'T BE ON THE SCREEN TODAY! MEET HOLLYWOOD'S MOST ROMANTIC COUPLE—THE MURPHYS

NOT to keep you in suspense, they're the George Murphys. They fell in love as kids, and at first sight. There had never been anyone else for either. George became a dancer to keep Julie from going to Florida with a show. They started their careers together and struggled together till they reached a point where George could go it alone. Then Julie bowed out. She's been asked a dozen times to make film tests. "One crazy person in the house is enough," she replies sweetly. "I'd rather concentrate on being his wife."

They still hold hands at the movies. They still prefer each other as dancing partners to anyone else. They still have more fun with each other than with anyone else. They like stepping out together, but they'd just as soon stay home, just so it's together. They have yet to be bored in each other's company.

"If the time ever comes," says George, "when I have to choose between marriage and the movies, I'll choose marriage. Peace of mind's more important than money. I can have peace of mind without the movies. I can't, without my wife."

It all goes back to the days when George was a Wall Street runner at fifteen per, and Julie came from Detroit to study dancing at Ned Wayburn's School. He hadn't chosen running as a career. Engineering was his business, but a cable broke in the Pennsylvania coal mines where he worked, and landed him on a sickbed. When he got up, he couldn't go back to the mines. Arriving in New York with a capital of seven dollars and thirty cents, he met a college friend who got him a job in his uncle's brokerage house.

He'd met Julie in Detroit, where he'd gone to visit a married sister. He'd liked her chestnut hair and blue eyes, her serenity and spunk. True to his Irish heritage, he was mercurial, shooting to the heights or the depths with equal ease. She was calm, cool and collected. It gave him a sense of comfort to be with her. Besides, she could always see the point of a joke, even when the joke was on her. What was more, she could cap it with a casual wit of her own. It struck George at once that here was a girl in a million.

In New York they saw each other often. One day Julie told him she was going to Florida with Ziegfeld's "Palm Beach Girl."

George turned moody. "Girls sometimes change when they go away with shows like that," he informed her darkly.

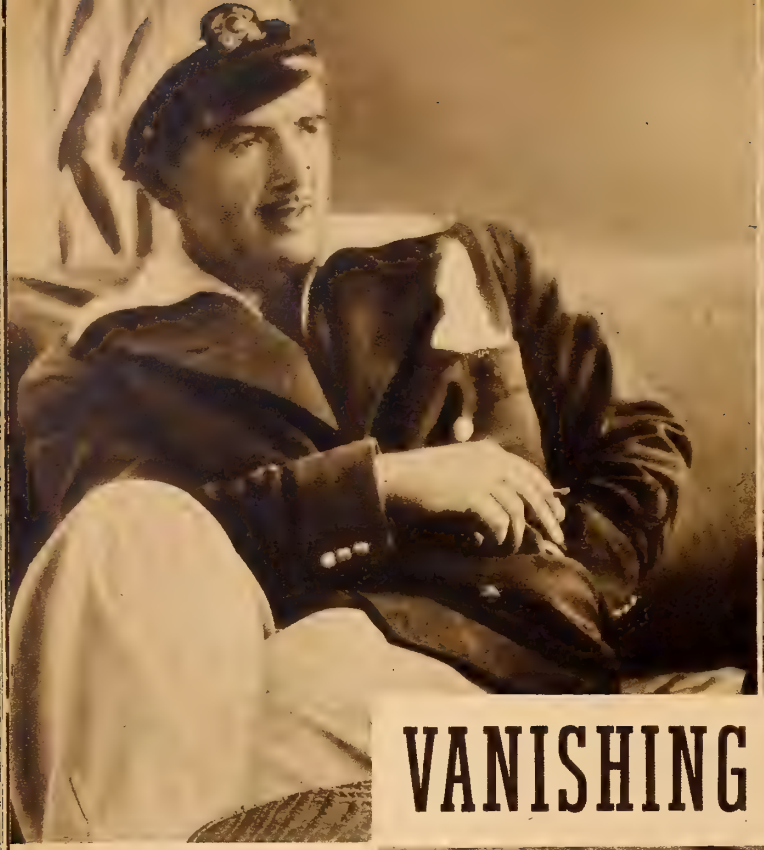
"Thanks, Murph. It's nice of you to think there's no room for improvement."

"Well, if you've got to go into show business, we'd be better off as a dance team."

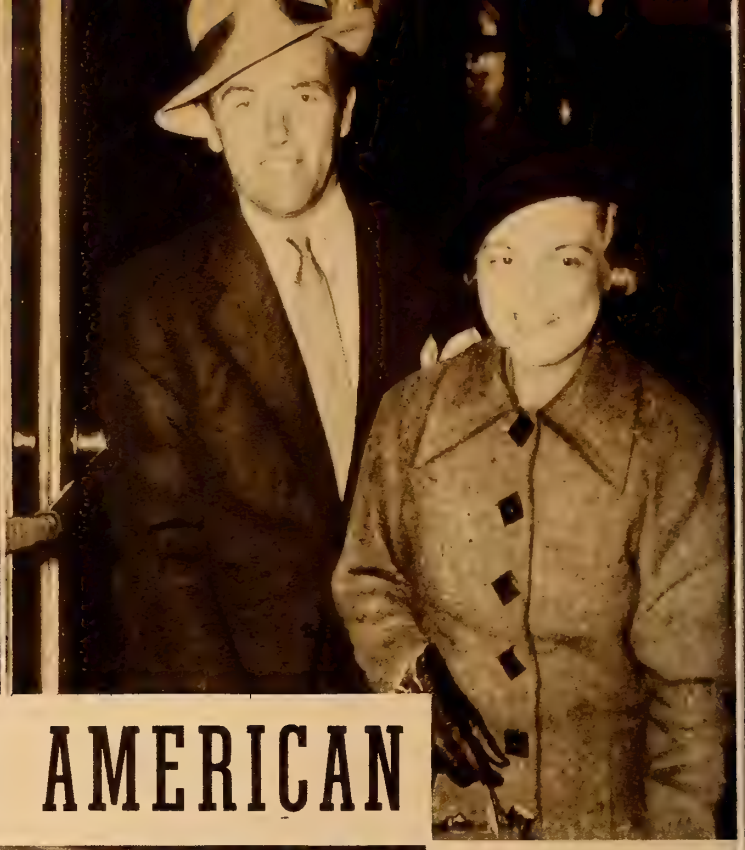
She eyed him for a moment, not knowing whether to laugh or scold. She saw he was dead in earnest, and obeyed an impulse. "If you can get us a job before the show leaves, I'll stay. If not, I'll go."

George has that other Irish quality of bullheadedness. He may have promised rashly. He'd make good his promise if flesh and blood and tenacity could do it. When the market closed at three, he'd be off on his hunt. His acquaintance was large, and he had a persuasive tongue in his head. It was that, rather than his dancing ability which finally won him a hearing with Emil Coleman, a bandleader he knew who conducted tea-dances at 10 East 60th Street. Coleman interceded for him with the manager. He and Julie danced for them.

"Hm," said the manager. "Not so hot."



"They'll improve," pleaded Coleman, who by this time had made their cause his own. "Besides, they know lots of kids around town. They'll bring 'em in." That had been George's strongest argument, and that argument clinched it.



"Try 'em," said the manager. "And tell 'em not to be so grim. Tell 'em to smile." (Continued on page 91)

George and Juliette Murphy fell in love as kids and have been at it ever since.

Eleanor Powell and George have so much fun dancing together they just hate to be paid for it! They do, huh?
